COAL DEPOSITS IN ALASKA.

Mr. BEVERIDGE introduced the following bills, which were read twice by their titles:
A bill (S. 6706) to reserve coal deposits in Alaska; and
A bill (S. 6707) to provide for leasing coal deposits in Alaska.
Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask that the bills be referred to the Committee on Territories.
Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the bill in reference to leasing coal lands should go to the Committee on Public Lands. I do not think legislation of that kind belongs to the Committee on Territories. I move that the bills be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.
Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know, Mr. President, that I shall have great objection to that reference just at present, though before I proceed further I want to say that I think in the future all matters, whether affecting fisheries or minerals or lands or transportation or courts or affecting anything else which exclusively concerns the district of Alaska should be referred to the Committee on Territories.
Since it appears that, in the immediate future at least we are not to have a local government for Alaska, and since it is plain that for the present we must continue to legislate here in Washington for Alaska in all particulars, it would seem that one committee could handle all affairs relating to Alaska in greater harmony and with more connected knowledge and intelligence than several committees. It is a more rational and certainly a safer method of legislation.
For example, some years ago, as the Senator well knows, the fish-tax law with respect to Alaska was repealed, the repeal of which, to use the Senator's own language, impaired the Alaska fund, which is the most valuable single practical law we have there, and which I think the Senator from Minnesota himself originated. Yet that bill dealing with Alaska was not considered by the Committee on Territories, although it had its effect upon the government and administration of that Territory. So with various other subjects.
As soon as the question of statehood is out of the way the Committee on Territories might as well be called the "Committee on Alaska," just as other committees are called "the Committee on Porto Rico," and so forth, or "the Committee on the Philippines," and so on. For it will then have no other duties to perform except to care for legislation concerning Alaska.
Since this legislation is more or less interwoven with the welfare of the district, its people, and the government thereof, I am glad the subject comes up now, because in the future I intend to present some remarks upon it. It would seem to be better if all subjects relating to this one great district should be handled by one committee instead of by several committees.
In saying this, Mr. President, of course I do not mean in any wise to disparage the eminent ability of other committees to take care of the respective subjects which are assigned to them. It is merely a matter of wise procedure and harmonious action and safe and comprehensive legislation.
Bills, for instance, concerning the disposition of coal lands and other deposits, and I suppose all lands in Alaska, heretofore have gone to the Committee on Public Lands. That is an excellent committee, of course, and the chairman of no committee in the Senate at present or in the past is a better chairman than the present chairman as to ability and experience and industry and integrity.
That is not the question. The question must come up sooner or later, in case Congress is to continue to legislate for this vast district—and I shall, in a moment, with the indulgence of the Senate, call attention to its incalculable resources—as to some one single committee which can act in harmony concerning fisheries and coal and copper and other resources; concerning the people and the courts and the government and everything relating to Alaska. If Congress is going to legislate for them, it must legislate for them through a single committee. I think, as a matter of plain common sense and of security, so that all subjects, when we legislate on one, may be before the same committee at the same time, should be dealt with by that one committee. How else can you have harmony of laws, or sanity in statutes, or even good sense in any of your Alaskan legislation? The Committee on Territories now has the responsibility. I shall insist therefore that in the future it also be given the power.
Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota insists upon these bills being referred to the Committee on Public Lands, I yield to that request for the present.
I am very glad, as I said, that the subject came up here and now, for I now serve notice that at some proper time in the future I shall submit to the Senate some remarks showing that the way to legislate harmoniously for a great district like that is through one committee. But if the Senator desires that these bills go to his committee at the present time, I have no objection; but hereafter all Alaska bills should come before the Alaska committee—the Committee on Territories—and I shall so insist.
Just at this juncture I want to point out one or two brief facts as to why these two bills were introduced. As all Senators and the whole country know, there was presented before the Committee on Territories some very interesting, not to say startling, testimony. I shall not go into that at this time, except only as to its effect on the immediate subject of these two bills.
The first of these bills provides that the withdrawals of all coal and similar deposits in Alaska which were made by executive order in 1906 shall now be made by an act of Congress, and therefore be beyond all question of dispute.

The second one is a brief framework of a law going to the principle that all of the coal deposits, to which I shall call the attention of the Senate in a moment, must be reserved to the United States and not under any circumstances pass, so far as their title is concerned, into private hands; that the surface must be separated from the coal deposits under the surface, and that the surface may be patented under the homestead or other law; but that the coal deposits underlying them shall be reserved to the United States and shall be developed only under the leasing system and the payment of a royalty for all coal taken out and marketed. That is the principle of these two bills.

Three years ago the Senator from Minnesota introduced a bill, a rather elaborate one, which it was at that time understood represented the views of the then administration and which presented, though not in so brief a form as this bill, the same principle. Yet to this day there has been no legislation upon the subject.

Now, Mr. President, returning to the testimony before the committee which gives point and substance to this particular thing at this time, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the testimony of the manager of "The Alaska Syndicate," who voluntarily appeared before our committee, and who represented "The Alaska Syndicate," which is made up of the M. Guggenheim Sons and J. P. Morgan & Co. interests, testified under cross-examination that the cash value of the Bering River coal fields alone was $900,000,000 gross; that it would probably take $700,000,000 out of this $900,000,000 to develop the coal fields and get the coal to the market, leaving a profit on the $700,000,000 of $200,000,000, or nearly 30 per cent. And these coal fields are quite near the seaboard, quite convenient to a port.

It was further testified that what is known as the "Matanuska coal fields," in the Cook Inlet region, were in themselves worth at least as much as the Bering River coal fields. That is another $900,000,000.

An examination which I have since made convinces me that these astounding figures are very conservative, to say the very least. Evidence which I have since examined shows that they are much beneath the real value. I do not mean to reflect upon the person who testified, but I mean to say that his estimate was quite low.

The probabilities are that these two coal fields alone, which have been thoroughly investigated, are worth $2,000,000,000.

In the center of the first one, in what is called the heart of the Bering River coal fields, which is near Controller Bay, not far from the seaboard, are located what is known as the "Cunningham group" of claims, the richest of that valuable field. These "Cunningham claims" are the heart of this rich field.

But, Mr. President, this is not all. I have secured the advanced report concerning Alaska of the Geological Survey, and it shows that, in addition to these two coal fields where $200,000,000 at least are accounted for, there are extensive coal deposits in the Alaska peninsula region, in the Yukon region, in the Seward Peninsula, and in northern Alaska.

To sum it all up, the Geological Survey estimates that in all the coal fields now known there is a tonnage of 15,104,500,000 tons, that the areas known to be underlain with coal aggregate 1,202.2 square miles, and that the present known coal fields aggregate an area of the enormous sum of 12,867 square miles.

That, Mr. President, upon the basis of the testimony of the manager of "The Alaska Syndicate" before our committee, would run the money value of the now known coal fields in Alaska into many billions; for with reference to these two, which are near the seaboard, it has been testified that there are nearly two billion already.

So it is certain that all the coal in Alaska is worth many billions of dollars—not many millions, but many billions. I will not say how many billions, for the aggregate astounds the understanding and probably would not be credited if expressed in dollars.

Mr. President, that enormous deposit of fuel will presently, if not, indeed, almost immediately, be needed to supply the Pacific coast region of our country, and the time is not far distant, as is shown by the rapidly depleting coal fields in the United States proper, when this great reserve will be indispensable for the fuel supply of the Nation.

The laws with reference to Alaska and the general land laws of the United States with reference to these subjects are different in important particulars.

For example, it is provided that coal lands in the United States proper, if within 15 miles of a railroad, shall be disposed of at $20, and if beyond 15 miles at $10; whereas in Alaska any coal lands must be disposed of at $10 an acre flat, no more and no less. I do not know why no more, but that is the language of the statute.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator please repeat that statement?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I say whereas the laws respecting the sale of coal lands in the United States proper provide that coal lands, if within 15 miles of a railway shall be disposed of at $20, and beyond that at $10, in Alaska the provision is $10 flat. The language of the statute is $10, and it does not provide either more or less.

Second, so far as I have been able to find in this hasty survey of Alaska on general laws, the coal lands in Alaska may be surveyed at the expense of the claimants, whereas in the United States proper they must be surveyed at public expense, by the Government in the usual way and claimants must wait for the government survey.

In the third place, by the act of 1898 individual claimants for any of these lands in Alaska who take them up and patent them may combine or assign them—may make a combination—up to the amount of 2,560 acres.

Under the general coal-land law, agreement for transfer and consolidation of claims before entry and payment therefor are fraudulent.

These, Mr. President, are enough to show that there are differences in the general laws and the Alaska laws upon coal deposits. But these startling figures which now not only have the authority of a department of the Government through the Geological Survey, but the testimony, before the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, of the manager of the syndicate now operating copper properties in Alaska, and which secured an option upon the heart of the Bering River coal fields, show the value of these great deposits to the American people in a fresh and startling way.

Possibly they were known before to those who had given the subject study. If so, those knowing the facts never enlightened the rest of us on the subject.

But, on the whole, it will be admitted that the American people had no definite conception of the immediate value of these coal fields which belong to them both as to their money value and as to getting the coal to market.

There was a general vague understanding that the mineral deposit of this district, which we bought from Russia for a song, was enormous, but we have now precise figures from parties more or less interested—more or less interested in the sense that they are building a road there and developing the lands, and so forth.

So this particular knowledge comes to us with a freshness and a vividness which will probably have its useful purpose not only in Congress, but throughout the country in calling attention to these priceless deposits of the mineral wealth belonging to the American people, and for the safeguarding of which steps should be at once taken.

I think, Mr. President, that is all I desire to say at the present moment. I yield to the request of the Senator from Minnesota that these bills shall be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. That has been the usual course in the past.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Indiana consents to a reference of the bills to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly, as to these bills and for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. NELSON. I simply want to say that the Committee on Public Lands is now considering this matter of coal-lands legislation in connection with other matters, and I have no doubt that the committee will in due season propose suitable legislation to cover it. Whether the committee will confine themselves to mere remarks or not I can not say, but they certainly will propose some suitable legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the request of the Senator from Minnesota to refer the bills——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let it be done on my request; for later I shall insist that all Alaska bills go to the Territories Committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota withdraws the motion, and the Senator from Indiana requests that the bills be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. That order is entered.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CULLOM submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $218.65 to reimburse the G. R. Caswell Lumber Company, an American corporation of Vermont, and W. K. Baldwin, a resident of Quebec, for losses sustained by fire caused by a surveying party in the employ of the International Boundary Commission, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment providing that the provisions of section 4 of the sundry civil bill of June 30, 1895, and acts amendatory thereof, approved June 11, 1896, and March 3, 1901, be extended over and shall apply to the desert lands included within the limits of the former Shoshone or Wind River Indian Reservation, in Wyoming, not included in any forest reservation, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $349,000 for improving the Arkansas River by the construction of two dredges and the necessary service boats, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ELKINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for improving Tug Fork, Big Sandy River, West Virginia, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing for the survey of Deckers Creek, West Virginia, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLINT submitted an amendment providing for the survey of Eel River from its mouth to Van Duzen River, California, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $12,000 for improving Redwood Creek, California, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIVELY submitted an amendment relative to the maintenance of the east breakwater in the harbor at Michigan City, Ind., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRYE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $32,000 for completing the improvement of Rockport Harbor, Maine, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PILES submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the Cowlitz and Lewis rivers, Washington, etc., to $34,100, $2,500 of which may be expended upon Lewis River and the North Fork thereof, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 19028. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

INCOME TAX.

Mr. BROWN. I ask to have Senate resolution 175 laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolution 175.

Mr. BROWN. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. BORAH on the 8th instant, as follows:

Senate resolution 175.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, directed to report to the Senate as early as may be practicable whether, in the opinion of the committee, the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as submitted to the States for ratification at the special session, would, if adopted, authorize Congress to lay a tax upon incomes derived from state bonds and other municipal securities or would authorize Congress to tax the instrumentalities or means and property of the State or the salary of state officers.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I hope to see this resolution adopted. I believe that it should command the support of every Senator. When it shall be reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, I trust it may bear to the Senate and the country the unanimous judgment of that great committee to the effect that the proposed amendment will not authorize any additional burden on the several States in the exercise of their sovereign rights guaranteed by the Constitution as it exists to-day. No one has ever questioned the power of the Government to tax incomes provided the tax was apportioned to the several States according to population. The question has arisen only when the tax was laid without such apportionment.

The proposed amendment has a single purpose, and that is to confer on Congress the undoubted power to tax incomes directly without regard to apportionment. To apportion a tax on incomes as now required by the law under the latest decision of the court amounts in effect to a denial of power to tax incomes at all because the public conscience will never sanction any tax apportioned according to population, for such an apportionment renders any tax so inequitable and unconscionable as to be intolerable.

THE LAST CHANCE.

The proposed amendment offers the people the only opportunity at hand, and likely to be at hand for generations, to remove the rule of apportionment as to income taxes and to clothe the Government with the right to exercise a power essential to the welfare and possibly the safety of the Nation. Its ratification, therefore, becomes a public necessity. Its rejection would be a public disaster.

In submitting the question to the New York legislature the other day, Governor Hughes said:

I am in favor of conferring upon the Federal Government the power to lay and collect such a tax. I believe that this power should be held by the Federal Government, so as properly to equip it with the means of meeting national exigencies. But the power to tax incomes should not be granted in such terms as to subject to federal taxation the incomes derived from bonds issued by the State itself or those issued by municipal governments organized under the State's authority. To place the borrowing capacity of the State and of its governmental agencies at the mercy of the federal taxing power would be an impairment of the essential rights of the State, which, as its officers, we are bound to defend.

We can not suppose that Congress will not seek to tax incomes derived from securities issued by the State and its municipalities. It has repeatedly endeavored to lay such taxes, and its efforts have been defeated only by implied constitutional restriction which this amendment threatens to destroy.

While we may desire that the Federal Government may be equipped with all necessary national powers in order that it may perform its national function, we must be equally solicitous to secure the essential basis of state government.

I therefore deem it my duty as governor of the State to recommend that this proposed amendment should not be ratified.

It will be observed in the first sentence of this notable message the governor asserts that he favors giving the Federal Government the power to lay and collect the tax. In the second sentence he asserts that incomes arising from state and municipal bonds should be exempted. Then follows the reason for the exception, to wit, that such a tax might impair the borrowing capacity of the State or its municipality. Whereupon the conclusion is reached that the amendment conferring the power he says he favors should be defeated.

GOVERNOR HUGHES STANDS ALONE.

Before entering upon a discussion of the question, it is encouraging to recall that, so far, all the governors of the States who have up to this time addressed their legislatures on the subject Governor Hughes stands alone in his fight against the amendment. Alabama, Ohio, Virginia, New Jersey, and other States have governors who not only favor conferring the power, but favor the proposed amendment which, if adopted, confers the power. It cheers our hearts to read in the press that President Taft agrees with the governor of New Jersey, who, in a message to his legislature February 7 and since the New York message was transmitted, took immediate and direct issue with the governor of New York.

CRITICS SILENT WHEN THEY SHOULD HAVE SPOKEN.

It is a very significant fact that this amendment, which was pending in Congress for days and was the subject of discussion by Congress and the press, should never have met this criticism while it was pending. In its present form it had the support of a unanimous Senate and a practically unanimous House of Representatives, who were all, judged by their votes, in favor of conferring this power on Congress, and yet no one in Congress ever suggested any change in the language of the resolution or proposed an amendment thereto to cover the objection now made.

Nor did any distinguished governor from any of the 46 States, all of whom are now very loud in their protestations that the Government should have the power to tax incomes without apportionment, ever suggest that the amendment should have been modified in form in any respect. In this body the State of New York enjoys representation of the very highest character and most eminent ability, and yet New York on the roll call, as shown in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, was in favor of this amendment as it passed Congress, and was silent as to any suggestion that the language was faulty. I would say in passing that I have greater regard for New York in the Senate than I have for New York out of the Senate on this question.

GOVERNORS WITHOUT POWER TO VETO.

The fathers provided that amendments to the Constitution should be ratified by state legislatures. The approval of the governors is not required. They do not even have the power to veto a legislative ratification resolution of any proposed amendment, although, I suppose, as a friend of the State, a sort of amicus curiæ, a governor may volunteer a harmless veto in advance of action by the legislature if he chooses to do so.

LEGAL EFFECT OF THE AMENDMENT.

The legal effect of the amendment as to whether or not it will allow, if adopted, incomes arising from state and municipal securities to be taxed was argued in the Senate the other day with great force by the distinguished senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I will not reopen that phase of the subject at this time further than to say that his conclusion, in the judgment of many able lawyers, is sustained by a fair interpretation of the Constitution construed as a whole.

The amendment does not alter or modify the relation to-day existing between the States and the Federal Government. That relation will remain the same under the amendment as it is to-day without the amendment. It is conceded by all that the Government can not under the present Constitution tax state securities or state instrumentalities. Nor can the State lay its taxing finger on federal bonds or federal agencies. Each is beyond the reach of the other as far as taxation is concerned. The proposed amendment in no sense seeks nor can it reasonably be argued to suggest any change in the independent or sovereign rights of either sovereignty as enjoyed and defined by the courts ever since the Government was organized.

FAVORS IN TAXATION ARE HATEFUL.

But, Mr. President, let it be assumed for the sake of debate that the conclusion of the Senator from Idaho is wrong and that the position of the distinguished governor of New York is right when he contends the proposed amendment confers on the Federal Government the power to tax incomes arising from state or municipal securities. It does not follow that the amendment should be rejected; on the contrary, it follows that it should be ratified. Because, under that interpretation, all incomes would be treated alike. No exemptions would be allowed and no exceptions permitted, save as Congress might and should exempt all incomes up to a certain amount.

There is a homely and rugged notion in the average American heart that the burdens of government should rest on everybody instead of on somebody. There is also a somewhat enthusiastic sentiment abroad in our land that the burdens should be borne by everybody in proportion to their ability to bear them, without regard to whether these abilities accrue from investments in farm lands or railroad stocks or state bonds. As a matter of common equity and evenhanded justice to the entire citizenship of the country, to exempt one class of incomes and tax another is abhorrent. Under the New York argument, the man who earns an income by his labor is properly taxable; the man who collects dividends from stocks in individual enterprises—railroad, mercantile, and manufacturing—is properly taxable; but the man whose income arises from investments in state or municipal bonds should be exempt from the income tax.

On its face the proposition does not commend itself. It does not square with the doctrine of equal rights. It is hateful to every sense of justice. It can not be defended in principle nor can it be used successfully, in my judgment, to defeat this amendment.

Of course, no man would think of insisting on such an unfair discrimination in favor of the owner of state securities, unless provoked to do so by some extraordinary reason. The eminent New York author of the argument undertakes to furnish the reason. The reason given is that to tax incomes arising from an investment in state and municipal bonds would be to impair the borrowing capacity of the State or municipality. Is this a valid argument against the ratification of the amendment which aims only to supply a reserve force in the Government which has been needed in the past and may be needed in the future?

Suppose the interest rates would be raised and the borrowing capacity of the State affected to that extent at the time an income tax is operative for the Nation's safety. In such an emergency the income tax will stand as a barrier to the impairment of the credit of the State, because the safety as well as the credit of the State would depend on the safety and security of the Nation. The income tax, to be used for the national defense, would become the protector of the State's credit and perhaps of its very existence. Should a foreign fleet bombard the city of New York, I can imagine the borrowing capacity of the Empire State might be impaired. But the impairment would be measured by the danger the assault brought to the Republic. In other words, New York's credit will be protected in proportion to the ability of the Federal Government to protect itself against the enemy.

When regiments must be equipped and armed, when battle ships must be rushed to the scene of danger without counting the cost, this Government should have the power to lay its tax upon the incomes of those who have them. It is the last resort. To withhold from the Government a power which may become so essential to its preservation is unpatriotic and can not be justified. It is to make our country ready for such an emergency that I plead with the States to ratify this amendment. We may never need to enact an income-tax law. I hope the emergency I have described may never arise. But should it come, the Republic should be clothed with full and ample authority to lay a just share of the burden upon the incomes of the whole country.

Governor Hughes does not make the point that an income tax would hurt the interest collector who would have to pay the tax, but it might, in some way not specified, hurt the credit of the interest debtor, the State, which would not have to pay the tax. If it would impair the borrowing capacity of the State to collect a tax from the man who loans the money to the State, it would in the same degree impair the borrowing capacity of the individual who borrows money, for the State and the individual borrow money from the same man—the man who has money to loan.

On that theory the States ought to exempt every banker and every money loaner from all taxes, for to tax them is to impair the borrowing capacity of the people who borrow.

I have heard, I think, all the arguments ever made against an income-tax law as an economic policy, but I confess I never heard the argument that such a law was undesirable because it might impair the credit of the borrower. And yet such an argument would have the same weight against an income-tax law—because it is identical in principle and effect—as it has against the income-tax amendment. The only possible ill effect such a tax could have in either case would be to raise the interest rate. That the increase would be much no one contends. That it would be trifling and inappreciable, if any at all, every reasonable man will admit. Who will argue that so remote a contingency as a possible insignificant increase in the interest rate carried in municipal and state bonds is a sufficient reason for striking the amendment down?

Governor Hughes insists that the Government should have the power because, in an emergency, it might need, for its preservation, to exercise the power to tax incomes.

Can it be possible, with the Nation's preservation at stake, this power must be denied because it might possibly increase slightly the interest rate of state bonds? Let me bring the New York argument home to the Senate. Suppose to-day our country is in trouble. Foreign foes are in arms against us; our import duties, the chief source of federal revenues, are impaired. The Nation has exhausted its credit; its bonds are below par; its Treasury empty; its preservation depends on a greater revenue. Congress returns, as a last resort, to a tax on incomes. The bill is here, the roll is called, and Nebraska votes against it, giving as her reason that it would impair her borrowing capacity. How much respect would New York and other States have for that reason? Very little, for everybody would know that such was not the real reason, and everybody would know the real reason for the vote was that Nebraska was opposed to taxing any incomes and not that she feared injury to her borrowing capacity.

And so it is with New York. If that State rejects the amendment she will do so because she is opposed to any tax on incomes at any time, and not because she is afraid her borrowing capacity will be impaired.

If government securities are good investments in times when the income tax is not required by the Federal Government, even though the purchaser takes a lower rate of interest than he would receive should he buy industrial securities, the investment would be just as good when the income tax takes its toll from both investments. The man who loans, whether it be to the State or to the individual, cares more for security than for great returns. The ordinary money lender is not willing to risk his entire principal in order to secure a higher rate of interest. It is for the reason that he feels absolutely secure in his interest and his principal that he willingly accepts a lower rate of interest from the State than from the individual.

When the time comes that the income tax is essential to the country's welfare, investors will all the more seek state and municipal securities. The State will be the last debtor to default. Values may fall on land and personalty so that security vanishes in a night, but the security given by the State and municipality will remain until the Government is swept from its foundation and anarchy takes its place.

THE TAX WOULD NOT IMPAIR THE CREDIT OF THE STATES.

But I deny that a tax on incomes arising from state and municipal bonds would in fact impair the credit of the State. To sustain my position, I call as witnesses every civilized nation which to-day enjoys and exercises the power to tax incomes. These witnesses are surely competent. They speak as experts. They have had experience. Experience is the safest and wisest teacher of economic truth. They are the German States, England, Austria, the Netherlands, Denmark, Sweden, the Swiss Cantons, and Italy. In none of these countries are incomes derived from governmental securities exempted from the tax. In England the Government deducts from the interest when she pays it to the bondholder the income tax due thereon. Will anyone contend that England's borrowing capacity has been impaired?

Great Britain, with a population of 42,000,000, has an enormous debt of nearly $4,000,000,000 bearing interest at the rate of 2½ per cent. Is her borrowing capacity impaired by her income tax? Does Great Britain fail to borrow what money she needs? Though every third man in the United Kingdom is without a job, while starvation or the workhouse stares his family in the face, although political unrest is abroad in the land, Great Britain has a borrowing capacity left, even though the tax collector takes out his portion from the interest paid to bondholders before it leaves the Bank of England.

Italy, with its population of 33,000,000, with its public debt of almost three billions, has an income-tax law which deducts the tax at the time the interest on the public bond is paid. Her securities find a ready market and the borrowing capacity of the Kingdom has not been impaired by the law.

The same is true of the German States, the Swiss Cantons, Sweden, the Netherlands, Belgium, and all of the nations which have income-tax laws on their statute books.

The United States, with 90,000,000 people and without an income tax, has borrowed less than a billion dollars, as the debt stands now. Great Britain and Italy together, having a less population than the United States, have borrowed more than seven times as much as this country.

The total incomes taxed by England in 1908 amounted, in round numbers, to $3,000,000,000. Of this sum, $80,000,000 represent incomes arising from investment in government securities and $120,000,000 represent salaries of public officers. The English public officer is not injured by the income tax, because his private income, which he probably surrendered to accept the public salary, would have been taxed had he remained in private life. The same thing would be true in this country.

This all goes to demonstrate that in those countries where an income tax is laid no appreciable injury has resulted to the governments which have permitted incomes arising from government securities to be taxed. No reason is suggested why the effect in this country would be any different. Every reason suggests the effect would be the same so far as the borrowing capacity of the States is concerned.

It must be remembered that the proposed amendment does not levy the tax. Its sole function is to confer on the Government the power to tax. The exercise of that power will be left to Congress. If its exercise will in fact impair or destroy the States, the responsibility will be on the men who compose the Congress of the United States. These men are chosen by constituencies in their home States and congressional districts. It is impossible to conceive that these men, devoted to the welfare of the States and districts they represent, and identified as they are with their industries, their commerce, and their prosperity, would allow any tax to be laid which would impair the rights of the people who sent them here. And yet it is seriously argued that these men representing all of the States of the Union may or will exercise the power conferred by this amendment to the injury, if not the destruction, of their States.

It seems to me that such an argument is so beyond the bounds of reason and so in conflict with the law of self-preservation as to be absurd. If Congress can not be trusted to protect the States against a destructive exercise of the power to tax incomes, the States are in grave danger, whether the amendment is adopted or not. For a Congress so indifferent to the welfare of the Republic as to use this power to tax incomes to the injury of the several States, if shorn of that power, would find other ways and means to carry on the work of destruction. For, Mr. President, with the States taxed out of existence, what is there left of the Republic? The Nation exists solely as a union of the several States. With the States destroyed, there is no Union.

In this country the Government employed the income tax in the sixties to protect the States and preserve the Union. It did not destroy the States then; it will not destroy them now. It has never been employed by this or any other Nation to the injury of any State or any subdivision of any government. It has had the contrary effect whenever and wherever tried.

This Republic has grown in territory, in strength, and in power far beyond the dreams of the men who laid its foundation. This growth is due, in my judgment, to the character and industry of the people—a people who have always stood for everything that was best in government. American ideals have grown higher as generations have come and gone since 1776, and to-day the standard of American citizenship represents more industry, higher character, and better civilization than it ever did before.

This proposition to amend the Constitution is one that has come from the people. They were surprised, shocked, and disappointed when the court, through the decision in the Pollock case, informed them that the Government was without the power to tax incomes unless apportioned according to population. They were surprised because it was a new decision and overturned the law as interpreted by the courts up to that time. It is to the great credit of President Taft that he sent a special message to Congress calling the attention of the people's representatives to the need for this amendment. In that message he spoke for the people; he spoke for every State in the Union; he spoke for the Republic. Congress passed the resolution by an almost unanimous vote. He approved it when it was passed. He approves it to-day.

The men and women of America approve it. There is no party politics in the question. One of the two great party organizations indorsed it in its last national platform. Both parties indorsed it when their Representatives almost to a man voted for it in Congress. No reasonable argument has yet been made against its ratification. It should, and I believe it will, be ratified by the States.

The perpetuity of our plan of government depends on the coexistence of state and federal authority. The life of one is essential to the life of the other. The destruction of either means the death of both. So that it is safe to presume that neither will be destroyed by the other unless the men and women whose Government this is determined to change its form and substitute a different plan. And when they so determine, the change will not be made by legislation nor by amendment to the Constitution, but by revolution.

Revolution is not in sight, Mr. President. The most morbid imagination is not able to find the slightest cause for such apprehension. With a people intelligent, hard-headed, practical, and in love with the Union and its flag, there is no danger of revolution; and there is no danger that the power conferred by this amendment will be used to destroy the States.

The amendment should be ratified—

First. Because it restores to the Government the right to exercise a power possessed and exercised at various times for more than a hundred years.

Second. Because it confers a power now enjoyed by every other sovereign nation in the world.

Third. Because, in times of peace, it may become necessary to the general welfare.

Fourth. Because, in national emergency, it may become necessary to the life of the Nation.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that the resolution may continue to lie on the table subject to call.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN ALLOTMENTS WITHIN NATIONAL FORESTS.

The bill (S. 5788) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make allotments within national forests was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make allotments within the national forests of not exceeding 80 acres of agricultural or 160 acres of grazing land to any Indian occupying, living on, or having improvements on land included within any such national forest who is not entitled to an allotment on any existing Indian reservation, or for whose tribe no reservation has been provided, or whose reservation was not sufficient to afford an allotment to each member thereof.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether the operation of this measure is limited to a particular section of the country?

Mr. CLAPP. No; I think not. It is a bill which has been recommended by the office, and the very——

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it proposed to give the Indian a preferential right over a white man by allowing him to make a home in a forest reservation?

Mr. CLAPP. It does not give him a preferential right.

Mr. HEYBURN. No such right rests in the white man.

Mr. CLAPP. The white man has a right to homestead——

Mr. HEYBURN. Within a forest reservation?

Mr. CLAPP. Within a forest reservation on lands that are agricultural.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would be difficult to find any adequate provision in the statute which gives him that right. There is a pretense of such right that is utterly unavailable. I did not observe, in listening to the reading of the bill, that there is the same limitation against the Indian that there is against the white man.

Mr. CLAPP. It is just the same. It has to be approved by the Forestry Bureau, through the Department of Agriculture. I think the Senator is probably correct in one respect. The statute gives the right of homestead in forest reserves. But this does not add anything to the right of the Indian as against the white man. It simply gives the department, when the reservation is exhausted, the right to allot to an Indian within a forest reservation, on the approval of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HEYBURN. Could an Indian, under the provisions of this bill, be brought from Arizona to Montana and given an allotment in a forest reserve in Montana?

Mr. CLAPP. Undoubtedly. To-day he can be brought from Arizona to Montana and given an allotment upon public land generally, the title to which is still in the Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Indian?

Mr. CLAPP. The Indian; under a law that was passed, I think, about two years ago.

Mr. HEYBURN. Without any reservation?

Mr. CLAPP. It was passed about a year ago. Yes; he is so allowed. If the Indian reservation is exhausted, so that the Indian can not obtain an allotment in his original reservation, to-day, under the law, he can be allotted anywhere in the United States upon public land.

Mr. HEYBURN. Against his protest?

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, no; certainly not. It is simply a right extended to him because his original reservation is exhausted; and this bill simply extends that right to the forest reserve, subject to the approval of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator understands that I am heartily in favor of allowing men, of whatever race, to take homes within forest reserves.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was only somewhat astonished to find that a measure came here with the recommendation of a department of the Government in favor of giving the Indians a larger right——

Mr. CLAPP. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. Than is accorded to white men.

Mr. CLAPP. No; it is just the same.

Mr. HEYBURN. It must have been declared to be agricultural land before the white man can enter upon it.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; and so it must under this bill before it can be allotted to the Indian. There is the same restriction precisely.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no objection to the principle. I was only astonished at the application of it by the department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ACCIDENTS ON INTERSTATE COMMON CARRIERS.

The bill (H. R. 3649) requiring common carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce to make full reports of all accidents to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and authorizing investigations thereof by said commission, was announced as the next business in order; and the Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. There are some changes to be made in that bill, I think, and I suggest that it be recommitted to the committee for the purpose of further consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF JOHN W. WEST, DECEASED.

The bill (S. 2430) for the relief of the heirs of John W. West, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to the heirs of John W. West, deceased, out of the funds of the Cherokee Nation of Indians, $5,000 and interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from September 16, 1884, in full payment for the property of West taken by the Cherokee national council October 30, 1843.

Mr. BACON. I would ask if there is a report accompanying the bill? The claim dates back a good long ways, and we ought to know something about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a report, and the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. CURTIS on the 18th instant.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, what is the parliamentary situation?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and is open to amendment. At the request of the Senator from Georgia, the report made by the Senator from Kansas is being read.

Mr. BACON. I shall be perfectly content if the Senator from Kansas will make a short statement. It may save time.

Mr. CURTIS. I was absent from the Chamber when the bill came up. The only amendment suggested by the committee is the one striking out the allowance of interest. The report is a very short one, and I ask that it may be read.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the report, which is as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred Senate bill 2430, submit the following report, and recommend the passage of the bill when amended as follows:

On page 1, lines 8, 9, and 10, strike out the following words:

"And interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from September 16, 1884."

This claim arises out of property owned by Bluford and John W. West, the former having a two-thirds and the latter a one-third interest, and taken by the Cherokee Nation under authority contained in the act approved October 30, 1843.

By the seventh article of the treaty of 1846 (9 Stat. L., 874) with the Cherokees it was provided:

"The value of all salines which were the private property of individuals of the Western Cherokees, and of which they were dispossessed, provided there be any such, shall be ascertained by the United States agent and a commissioner to be appointed by the Cherokee authorities; and, should they be unable to agree, they shall select an umpire, whose decision shall be final; and the several amounts found due shall be paid by the Cherokee Nation, or the salines returned to their respective owners."

In 1873 Mrs. Markham, administratrix of the estate of Bluford West, presented the claim of the heirs of Bluford West to the Cherokee national council, which appropriated $12,000 in full settlement thereof. (See letter of Assistant Secretary Wilson, Mar. 21, 1908, p. 3.) John W. West received no part of the above amount.

In November, 1882, the department found that the Cherokee Nation had not followed the treaty in fixing the value of some of the property taken and directed the nation to proceed in accordance with the treaty. D. W. C. Duncan was appointed by the Cherokee Nation to assist John Q. Tufts, Indian agent at the Union Agency, in ascertaining the value of the property. (See letter Assistant Secretary Wilson, Mar. 21, 1908, p. 5.) After an elaborate investigation, during which much testimony was taken (decision Secretary Lamar, Apr. 26, 1886, pp. 3, 4), the commission found:

"This testimony going to show that John W. West held a third interest in the saline is not contradicted by any satisfactory showing. Joel M. Bryan and Mrs. Nancy Markham both testify that they were not aware that he had any interest in the saline (testimony, pp. 117, 154); at the same time, however, Mr. Bryan knew that he was prosecuting a saline claim at Washington.

"It is the opinion of this commission that John W. West, in his lifetime and at the date of his death, was justly entitled to a one-third interest in the saline in question, and that by means of his death his heirs or legal representatives have rightfully succeeded to the same.

"As to who these heirs are, see testimony, page 100.

"If the valuation ($15,000) approved by this commission should be sustained, then there will be due the heirs of John W. West the sum of $5,000. * * *"

In transmitting the findings of the commission to the Secretary, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs (decision Secretary Lamar, Apr. 26, 1886, p. 5) recommended that as the department had no funds out of which the amount found due the heirs of John W. West could be paid the claimants "should be left to pursue their remedy before the Cherokee authorities."

On August 29, 1883, the finding of the commission was approved by the Secretary. (See Secretary Lamar's decision, p. 5.)

Later the case was reopened, and on September 16, 1884, Secretary Teller rendered a decision affirming the decision of August 29, 1883, holding that the heirs of John W. West were entitled to $5,000 for the property taken. The Secretary concluded his decision (see Secretary Lamar's decision, pp. 6, 7), as follows:

As to the claim of the heirs of John W. West, deceased:

"I therefore decline to reconsider the decision of the department of August 29, 1883, for the purpose of declaring that that part of the report of the commission relating to John W. West or his heirs is outside of the scope of their duties under the treaty.

"In the decision of August 29, 1883, your recommendations 'that the heirs of John W. West should be left to pursue their remedy before the Cherokee authorities, if they see fit, without interference in their behalf by the department,' was concurred in.

"It now appears by papers filed by Allen Gilbert as attorney and agent for the heirs of John W. West, deceased, that the claimants presented said claim to the Cherokee National Council held in November, 1883, praying for its allowance and payment, that the said council adopted a report, adverse to the payment of the claim, made by a committee of that body, and that said council still refuses to pay the claim or any part thereof; in view of these facts, he claims that it is the right of the United States Government, as a party to the treaty, to insist on its fulfillment by the Cherokee Nation, and he therefore prays that such steps may be taken by this department as will secure the rights of the claimants.

"The treaty provided that if the United States agent and Cherokee commissioner fail to agree 'they shall select an umpire whose decision shall be final; and the several amounts found due shall be paid by the Cherokee Nation or the salines returned to their respective owners.'

"The Cherokee Nation has not only failed but refuses to comply with the terms of the treaty. There are no funds to the credit of the Cherokee Nation out of which this department can order payment of the amount claimed by the heirs of John W. West, deceased, and as it is therefore not considered within the power of this department to enforce payment of the claim without special legislation by Congress therefor. The matter should be presented to the Congress for appropriate action.

"In order to do this you will prepare and submit the necessary papers in proper form, to be laid before Congress at the approaching session."

Later the case was again reopened, upon representation by counsel for the heirs of Bluford West that new evidence had been discovered, and on April 26, 1886, after careful review, Secretary Lamar rendered a decision (H. Rept. No. 2397, 50th Cong., 1st sess., p. 7), concluding as follows:

"No new evidence has been presented since the decision of September 16, 1884. The hearing took place on the 22d and 23d instant, and all the matter stated in argument by the attorneys and counsel have been carefully considered, and the conclusion reached is that no good and sufficient reason has been shown for disturbing the decision on the claim of August 29, 1883, reaffirmed by decision of September 16, 1884.

"On the other hand, it is made more clearly to appear that the action already had on the case was right and just."

Bills providing for the payment of this claim have been reported from the Committees on Indian Affairs in the Fiftieth, Fifty-second, and Fifty-fourth Congresses.

Mr. CURTIS. I think that is a substantial and full statement of fact. The payment provided for is to be made out of the Cherokee fund and not out of the funds of the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if that is the reason why the committee ignored the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior and allowed the provision to remain in the bill that interest should be paid? Of course the Senator knows—we hear it every day—that the Government never pays interest. I do not quite agree to that. Is the Senator going to propose an amendment?

Mr. CURTIS. The committee report an amendment striking out the part of the bill providing for the payment of interest. The amendment is stated in the report.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not know but that the Senator thought it was proper that interest should be paid, inasmuch as the transaction is between the Indians themselves and the Government is not a party to it.

Mr. CURTIS. The position taken by the committee was that no interest should be allowed.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas whether it is a fact that the Cherokee Nation is still opposing this payment.

Mr. CURTIS. The last time the bill was presented to the council it was refused, and I understand that they are still opposed to the payment of this claim.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether the Cherokee Indians were represented before his committee on this examination.

Mr. CURTIS. I may say to the Senator that neither side was represented. The bill was referred to me, and I passed upon it after an examination of all the papers sent up from the department, and after a very careful examination. I declined to report the bill until after I had submitted my decision to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who is a member of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and I think he concurred in my conclusions.

Mr. BACON. I, of course, have no right to represent the Indians particularly, except I think we always ought to represent them. I should like, however, to have the bill go over until the Senator from Oklahoma is present.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. We had better amend it first.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the amendment of the committee be agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to the Senate acting upon the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 8, after the word "thereon" strike out "at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, from September 16, 1884."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 30, 31, 32, 50, 52, and 56.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 33, 35, 36, 37, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 53, 54, and 55, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lines 18 and 19 of the matter proposed to be inserted in said amendment strike out the words "and for sales to officers" and the comma following; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed in said amendment insert the words "and hereafter transportation may be furnished for the owned horses of an officer, not exceeding the number authorized by law, from point of purchase to his station, when he would have been entitled to and did not have his authorized number of owned horses shipped upon his last change of station, and when the cost of shipment does not exceed that from his old to his new station;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted in said amendment insert the words "twelve thousand dollars; of a colonel or officer above the rank of captain, ten thousand dollars; and of an officer of and below the rank of captain, six thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendment numbered 21 the committee of conference has been unable to agree.

F. E. WARREN,
MORGAN G. BULKELEY,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. A. T. HULL,
GEO. W. PRINCE,
WILLIAM SULZER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Wyoming what amendment it is that the conferees have failed to agree upon?

Mr. WARREN. One amendment which provides for raising at retirement certain brigadier-generals to the rank of major-general. It applies only to four or five remaining civil-war veterans who have served from forty-five to fifty years. That is in disagreement.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill does not provide absolutely for these promotions. It is left optional, I understand, with the President.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; the Senator is right.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. He can appoint one or two or four or five.

Mr. WARREN. The President may, in his discretion, do that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendment numbered 21, that a further conference be asked, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. BULKELEY, and Mr. OVERMAN the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

CITY AND SUBURBAN RAILWAY.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15676) to provide for the extension of the underground system of the City and Suburban Railway Company on North Capitol street, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF BOUNTY-LAND LAWS.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1408) to extend the provisions of the existing bounty-land laws to the officers and enlisted men, and the officers and men of the boat companies, of the Florida Seminole Indian war.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAROLE OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5287) to parole juvenile offenders.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

It provides that every female juvenile offender who is now or may hereafter be committed to the Reform School for Girls of the District of Columbia, and who has by her conduct given sufficient evidence that she has reformed, may be released on parole as hereinafter provided.

If it shall appear to the satisfaction of the board of trustees of the school that there is reasonable probability that any girl detained in the school will, if conditionally released, remain at liberty without violating the laws, then the board of trustees may, in its discretion, parole such girl under such conditions and regulations as the board of trustees may deem proper. But the parole of all such juvenile offenders committed by courts other than those of the District of Columbia shall be subject to the approval of the Attorney-General of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD D. GILBERT.

Mr. BULKELEY. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 6089) to correct the military record of Edward D. Gilbert.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of War to review the military record of Edward D. Gilbert, late a private in Company I, Twenty-first Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, and to grant him an honorable discharge as of date March 17, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECLAMATION FUND.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5705) to authorize the issue and sale of certificates of indebtedness against the reclamation fund.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, that order will be followed.

R. B. WHITACRE & CO.

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6166) for the relief of R. B. Whitacre & Co.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "of," to strike out "$1,056" and insert "$942.97," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $942.97 to R. B. Whitacre & Co., of St. Paul, Minn., in payment for material used in constructing government work at Bellefourche, S. Dak.

The amendment was agreed to.

JAMES D. ELLIOTT.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 193) for the relief of James D. Elliott.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. How much money is involved in it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay James D. Elliott, for services performed as United States district attorney for the district of South Dakota from July 11, 1906, to March 4, 1907, the sum of $2,599.99.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 24, 1910, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 23, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, our Heavenly Father, whose ways are past finding out, yet we can not think of ourselves apart from Thee, we realize that we are so involved in Thy love that nothing can separate us from Thee. Hence we come in perfect faith and confidence praying for the Members of this House who are languishing on beds of sickness. If it is in accordance with Thy divine plan we pray that they may be restored to health, strength, and usefulness; but if not, prepare them, we beseech Thee, for that transition which sooner or later comes to us all, and be with those who are watching the inroads of disease lest their dear ones be taken from them. Comfort them with the thought that somewhere, some time, some how, all will be made right. Hear us and answer us, in the name of Christ Jesus, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REPEAL OF SECTION 860, REVISED STATUTES.

The SPEAKER. This being calendar Wednesday, the call rests with the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, there was pending last Wednesday H. R. 16367, a bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and by authority of that committee I call the bill up.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16367) to repeal section 860 of the Revised Statutes.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 860 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, we would like to have some explanation regarding this.

Mr. TIRRELL. I will yield what time is necessary to the gentleman having charge of the bill, Mr. DIEKEMA.

Mr. DIEKEMA. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to repeal one of the sections of the Revised Statutes, to wit, section 860. First of all, this legislation was called to the attention of Congress by the Attorney-General, who in his last report recommended the repeal of this section. This section is a short one and I will read it for the information of the House. It reads as follows:

SEC. 860. No pleading of a party, nor any discovery or evidence obtained from a party or witness by means of a judicial proceeding in this or any foreign country, shall be given in evidence, or in any manner used against him or his property or estate, in any court of the United States, in any criminal proceeding, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture: Provided, That this section shall not exempt any party or witness from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in discovering or testifying as aforesaid.

In other words, this section provides first that no pleading of any party shall be so used; second, that no discovery of any party shall be so used, and, third, that no evidence of any party shall be so used.

This is what we might call an immunity statute. The object of Congress in passing this legislation was this: That the Government might be enabled to compel the testimony of a party when his testimony would be incriminating in order that the Government might have the benefit of the disclosure which he thus made. This ran along for many years until in 1890 in the city of Chicago it was determined by the grand jury to investigate certain railroads coming from the West and leading toward Chicago as to the rates fixed on grain.

A man by the name of Councilman was brought before this grand jury and he was asked in the first place, "Have these railroads or any of them given you any special rates?" In the next place, "Have you been paid any rebates by these railroads or by any of them?" He stood upon his rights and said, "I refuse to answer any of these questions because they are incriminating." This body took the question to Judge Gresham. Judge Gresham said, "You must answer because you are protected by section 860 of the Revised Statutes which gives you immunity under these circumstances." He refused to answer and a penalty of $500 was imposed, including costs. He still refused to answer, and the case was taken to the court of appeals. From there it was taken to the United States Supreme Court, and then for the first time the United States Supreme Court said the man was entirely right because this section 860 is not as broad in its scope as is the constitutional provision which gives a man the right to refuse to incriminate himself in any criminal case. In other words, the Supreme Court said that a man is not only entitled to this privilege under the Constitution when a criminal case is pending against him personally, but he is not obliged to divulge in any criminal proceeding any information which might subsequently lead to his arrest.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Do I understand the gentleman to contend that he is attempting by this bill to repeal an immunity provision of the statute?

Mr. DIEKEMA. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Then what becomes of the contention of the Supreme Court that this statute in itself is not as broad as the constitutional provision?

Mr. DIEKEMA. This follows, that the protection of any witness still remains, as far as the Constitution is concerned. In other words, a broader protection, a wider scope, is provided by the Constitution than this law provided. Mr. Speaker, I come now to the iniquity of this statute as it now stands. The Supreme Court has said that no man can be compelled to testify under the protection of this statute, because the protection is not as broad as that given by the Constitution. What has been the result? In two instances, namely, in relation to the interstate-commerce law and the Sherman antitrust law, Congress has passed special immunity laws and has provided that under these special immunity laws the witness can be compelled to testify, because the immunity given under these two statutes is as broad, as wide, as the Constitution itself. Now, then, it is no longer possible under section 860 to compel the testimony of anybody. What is the result? A man is on trial for a crime, and it is learned that he has filed affidavits or has testified in a civil case. Under this statute they can not be used against him in a criminal case. A man may make a statement, for instance, when he comes from abroad and brings in goods, saying that there are no goods subject to duty. Subsequently it is found that there are such goods.

The man pleads guilty in a criminal case. The next thing the Government does is to institute a forfeiture proceeding, to forfeit the goods to the Government which this man brought in. Then the Government attempts to introduce the pleading in the criminal case, to say that this man plead guilty and has served a term in the penitentiary on his own plea. Under the protection of this statute that pleading, that plea of guilty, can not be used against him at all. Hence the result of this statute, since the decision of the Supreme Court, has become simply a shield to the criminal and in no way aids the Government in prosecuting any of these cases. Under these circumstances the Government feels that the statute should be immediately repealed, and this bill comes here with the unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary asking that this statute be repealed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If the Government wants to convict this man, what does it summon him as a witness for in another proceeding?

Mr. DIEKEMA. This statute provides that a man may go voluntarily and make a statement without being summoned by the Government and still the cloak is over him; still he is protected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but the way those men escaped out there at Chicago was that the Government harnessed them up in some kind of a proceeding and made them testify, then afterwards indicted them, and they came in and said they were immune because they had been harnessed up in this other proceeding, and the court so held.

Mr. DIEKEMA. Just one moment. That was not exactly the way. A witness there refused to testify. He did not claim his immunity. He said the statute gave no adequate immunity, and in spite of the statute he would not testify, and the Supreme Court said that his contention was correct; that it was not an adequate immunity, and he was not compelled to testify.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I am asking is, If the Government wants to prosecute A, what does it go to work and in another proceeding summon him there as a witness for, when it knows that will act as an immunity bath, as Attorney-General Moody called it?

Mr. DIEKEMA. I will state that this statute applies to voluntary statements, to pleadings made by the party himself, to civil cases, as well as to criminal cases, and there is the iniquity of the present statute.

If it only referred to cases where a man was brought in by the Government and asked to testify it might be different, but it refers to all this class of cases.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIEKEMA. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. As I understand the gentleman, then, a man now may come into court voluntarily and plead orally or in writing or testify before the grand jury or before a court and then claim immunity, not under the Constitution, but under the provisions of this statute?

Mr. DIEKEMA. Surely. A man may now go before the grand jury to testify, as was done in the sugar cases four distinct times, as to a certain statement of facts. Then he may go into the trial court and give an entirely different version, and yet the Government can not bring in a contradictory statement he has made before the grand jury when he is actually on trial in the trial court.

Mr. MANN. If he is on trial for perjury you can.

Mr. DIEKEMA. There is one exception under the statute, and that is the one the gentleman from Illinois suggests; he can be tried for perjury, and here is the difficulty about this. The gentleman from Illinois is an able lawyer and he must understand the difficulty of convicting for perjury. In the first place, it will not do to allege that the witness made one statement before the grand jury and a different statement before the trial court and consequently is guilty of perjury, but the indictment must set forth the very words alleged to be perjury, and the fact that he swore one way once and another way another time is not sufficient ground for the allegation for perjury, and the difficulty of convicting for perjury is so great that although section 860 specially excepts perjury its other vices are so great that repeal is necessary.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. As I gather the object of this proposed legislation now—I am free to say it was not very clear in the beginning—but I gather that this proposed legislation is an attempt to limit immunity. In other words, the section is broader than the constitutional provision?

Mr. DIEKEMA. No; the Constitution is broader than the section. If the gentleman doubts the statement, I will read a statement that will undoubtedly clear up the whole matter, after which the gentleman can not have any doubt. This is the language of Justice Field:

> It is quite clear that legislation can not abridge a constitutional privilege, and that it can not replace or supply one, at least unless it is so broad as to have the same extent in scope and effect. It is to be noted of section 860 of the Revised Statutes that it does not undertake to compel self-incriminating evidence from a party or a witness. In several of the state statutes, above referred to, the testimony of the party or witness is made compulsory, and in some either all possibility of a future prosecution of the party or witness is distinctly taken away or he can plead in bar or abatement the fact that he was compelled to testify.
> We are clearly of opinion that no statute which leaves the party or witness subject to prosecution after he answers the criminating questions put to him can have the effect of supplanting the privilege conferred by the Constitution of the United States. Section 860 of the Revised Statutes does not supply a complete protection from all the perils against which the constitutional prohibition was designed to guard and is not a full substitute for that prohibition. In view of the constitutional provision, a statutory enactment to be valid must afford absolute immunity against future prosecution for the offense to which the question relates. In this respect, we give our assent rather to the doctrine of Emery's case, in Massachusetts, than to that of People v. Kelly, in New York, and we consider that the ruling of this court in Boyd v. United States (116 U. S., 616; 29, 746) supports the view we take. Section 860, moreover, affords no protection against that use of compelled testimony which consists in gaining therefrom a knowledge of the details of a crime and of sources of information which may supply other means of convicting the witness or party.

So that the Supreme Court has held that the Constitution is broader than the statute.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DIEKEMA. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman in all that he has stated, but the statute, section 860, goes further than immunity as to evidence given in a case. The gentleman's statement has related only to evidence furnished in a case, but the proposition to repeal goes much further than that. The statute reads "any pleading by a party nor any discovery or evidence obtained from a party." Now, all the statements the gentleman has made so far relate to the giving of evidence. What about the question of a pleading by a party? Ought not a party be permitted to plead without having his pleading used against him in evidence?

Mr. DIEKEMA. He ought not to be, and there is no statute in any State of the Union, I am informed, where he has the privilege. If a man makes an affidavit, files it in any case which contradicts his statement under oath in a trial of another case, that affidavit ought to be presented, and he ought to be required to explain why on that occasion he swore differently from what he does at present.

Mr. MANN. He may not have any oath at all. It may not be a matter of oath. A man may file a pleading in a case. Is that pleading to be used against him?

Mr. DIEKEMA. That is entirely governed by the common law. A pleading can be introduced in our state practice in any case, but certainly this pleading would not refer to the general pleadings as it is understood commonly in the parlance of the lawyer—would not refer to a declaration or a plea; but this word "pleading," as considered by the courts in this case, is the contradictory statement under oath.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be correct, but that is not my understanding. I think the word "pleading" covers a declaration or any pleading that is filed in a case. The pleading can not be used against him in the trial of a criminal case, and the pleading in a criminal case can not be used against a man in the trial of a civil case. That is a different proposition from meeting the difficulty——

Mr. DIEKEMA. Not only can a pleading be used, but any statement made by him outside of court against his interest, to anybody, can be used.

Mr. MANN. But under this statute that pleading can be used.

Mr. DIEKEMA. And if this statement made by him to any witness can be used against him subsequently, then why not a solemn declaration under oath?

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not saying whether it ought to be used or not. I do not undertake to know. But here is a proposition to repeal several requirements of the statute because one of them works injustice to the Government, and it seems to me that it is a matter that ought to receive consideration.

Mr. DIEKEMA. Not only does one of them work injustice, but they all work injustice. For instance, here is the original statement made, "as he transports his goods to this country." Why should not that original statement be used?

Mr. MANN. That is not a pleading.

Mr. DIEKEMA. It is so considered.

Mr. MANN. I am not sure it ought to be used.

Mr. DIEKEMA. I am.

Mr. MANN. This is a complete reversal of the policy of the Government.

Mr. DIEKEMA. It is not a complete reversal of the policy of the Government. Congress would never have enacted this statute if they had not felt sure that as a result of it they would be enabled to compel the testimony of witnesses. That was the ground upon which Congress passed this bill. That was the policy underlying this legislation.

Mr. MANN. That certainly was not the policy as to pleading. It was the policy perhaps as to discovery, the policy as to evidence, but plainly not the policy as to pleading, because the Government does not effect the question of pleading in a civil suit.

Mr. KOPP. Does this apply to pleadings in a bankruptcy court?

Mr. DIEKEMA. This applies to any kind of a criminal proceeding.

Mr. KOPP. Supposing a voluntary bankrupt in his examination, we will say, in the disposition of his property, has violated the criminal law, would this statute prevent the introduction of voluntary testimony?

Mr. DIEKEMA. It would, absolutely. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution and bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 38. Joint resolution fixing the terms of court in the Philippine Islands;

S. 5252. An act to authorize the closing of a part of Forty-first street NW., in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

S. 3254. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poisons in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 7, 1906, by prohibiting the sale of poisonous hair dressing; and

S. 646. An act for the relief of the estate of Julius Jacobs.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 137. Joint resolution to continue in full force and effect an act entitled "An act to provide for the appropriate marking of the graves of the soldiers and sailors of the confederate army and navy who died in northern prisons and were buried near the prisons where they died, and for other purposes;"

H. R. 17514. An act to authorize the extension of Twenty-third and R streets SE., in the District of Columbia; and

H. R. 16331. An act to acquire land in the vicinity of the Connecticut Avenue Bridge for the extension of certain streets.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 4617) to acquire land in the vicinity of the Connecticut Avenue Bridge for the extension of certain streets.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 5680. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Connecticut River, in the State of Connecticut, between the towns of Old Saybrook and Old Lyme; and

S. 6191. An act to authorize the Fort Smith and Van Buren district to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River at Van Buren, in the State of Arkansas.

ASSIGNMENT OF JUSTICES IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 20835.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico are hereby vested with power and authority to assign from time to time, as they may deem proper, any or either of said judges to any or either of the respective judicial districts of said Territory, and each judge, after assignment, shall reside in the district to which, for the time being, he may be assigned.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? Has not the Senate passed a Senate bill covering this same thing?

Mr. TIRRELL. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL], who has charge of this bill, can answer that question.

Mr. MANN. I am under the impression that the Senate has passed a Senate bill covering this matter.

Mr. TIRRELL. The Judiciary Committee has not been informed of that fact.

Mr. MANN. However, I would not be sure that the Senate passed it. I think I read it in the RECORD, however, and I think we had better delay this until we find out.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, on such indefinite information as that I do not think the bill should be postponed. I yield such time as may be desired to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL], who has charge of the matter.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Speaker, this bill authorizes the chief justice and associate justices of the Territory of New Mexico to divide the Territory in judicial districts and assign the judges to the several districts. It appears that under an existing statute this power was conferred upon the chief justice and associate justices. About a year or more ago this power was exercised by the judges. Owing to the physical condition of one of the judges it becomes necessary to rearrange the assignment, but this can only be done by obtaining this legislation, as it is maintained that the power heretofore conferred has been exhausted. The bill is satisfactory to all the judges of that Territory and to the Attorney-General.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 15676. An act to provide for the extension of the underground system of the City and Suburban Railway Company on North Capitol street, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15384) making appropriation for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, had further insisted upon its amendment disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. BULKELEY, and Mr. OVERMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

LIABILITIES OF COMMON CARRIERS TO THEIR EMPLOYEES.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill H. R. 17263.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases," approved April 22, 1908, be amended in section 6, so that said section shall read:

"SEC. 6. That no action shall be maintained under this act unless commenced within two years from the day the cause of action accrued.

"Under this act an action may be brought in a circuit court of the United States, in the district of the residence of either the plaintiff or the defendant, or in which the cause of action arose, or in which the defendant shall be found at the time of commencing such action. This act shall not be construed as excluding the exercise of a concurrent jurisdiction of cases arising under the act by the courts of the several States."

SEC. 2. That said act be further amended by adding the following section as section 9 of said act:

"SEC. 9. That any right of action given by this act to a person suffering injury shall survive to his or her personal representative, for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee, and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee."

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out, beginning with the word "this," in line 2, on page 2, down to and including the word "States," in line 5, on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States under this act shall be concurrent with that of the courts of the several States."

Strike out the period after the word "employee," in line 13, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof a comma, and add after said comma the following:

"But in such cases the recovery shall be limited to compensatory damages and there shall be only one recovery for the same injury."

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as may be desired to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], who has charge of the bill.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, this proposed amendment makes three changes in the employers' liability law. As the law is now suit can be brought only in the district where the defendant is an inhabitant. It has been so held by one of the federal courts in Texas. This amendment proposes to allow the plaintiff to begin suit in the district where the plaintiff lives, or in the district where the defendant lives, or in the district where the injury occurred, or in the district where the defendant may be found at the time action is commenced.

The second change in the law provides that the federal courts and the state courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction. I am very sure that they have concurrent jurisdiction as the law is now, but on account of a decision of one of the state courts of Connecticut, where one judge declined to take jurisdiction in a case because it was under a federal statute, the committee thought best to expressly provide in the law that the federal courts and the state courts should have concurrent jurisdiction to avoid the possibility of such a construction in the future.

The third amendment relates to the survival of the action. One of the courts in Connecticut held that under this law, where the injured party died before action was commenced or after action was commenced from some other cause than the injury, the action did not survive to the personal representative of the deceased. This provides that the action shall survive to the personal representative for the benefit of the widow or next of kin in the order named in the original law.

These are the only changes made in the proposed amendment. I think they are all necessary to make the law more effective and carry out the real intent of Congress in the original act.

Mr. MANN. Will my colleague yield to a question?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I notice the committee recommends an amendment providing that the recovery, where the injured person is dead and the suit is brought in behalf of those dependent upon him, shall be limited to compensatory damages. Is the gentleman able to inform us what the general practice in the States is with reference to such actions by those left?

Mr. STERLING. I am of the opinion that generally where action is given by state statutes to the representatives of the deceased person dying from personal injury they can not recover for pain and suffering. I know that is the law in Illinois. I believe it is the law generally in the States. This change as made by the committee in the bill is to expressly limit recovery to compensatory damages only in the case where the action survives by virtue of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MANN. Why should there be any distinction?

Mr. STERLING. I think it has not been the policy to allow the survivor to recover for pain and suffering. I think the theory of the law in such cases is to make the estate of the deceased person whole, and to allow the survivor to recover what his estate lost in the way of time and expenses incurred in being cured. I believe that is the theory of the law in all the States, so far as I am informed.

Mr. MANN. Would not that be a matter for the courts to determine, if the amendment did not prevail?

Mr. STERLING. No doubt it would. I think the bill would be just as well without this additional amendment. I think this simply leaves in the statute what the court would hold to be the right of recovery without this amendment in the bill.

Mr. MANN. I will not ask the gentleman if this is a dangerous limitation, because the gentleman is defending the bill on the floor of the House and the committee has made no amendment.

Mr. STERLING. I do not think it is dangerous.

Mr. MANN. I think it is a dangerous limitation.

Mr. STERLING. I do not think it is a dangerous limitation. I think it is neither harmful nor useful. I am very sure, so far as my observation and experience go, that the trial court would limit the recovery to compensatory damages anyhow in a case where the action is made to survive.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I want to say for the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois that, so far as I know, in every State in the Union the recovery for death is limited in this way; but, of course, as he suggests, strictly by statute. What is known as "Lord Campbell's act" has been duplicated by almost every legislature, so far as I know; but what I wanted to ask the gentleman was, in this matter of the survival of the action for the benefit of the widow, the husband, or the children, has there been any decision of the courts as to the order in which they take? In my State this matter is fixed by the statute of distribution, but it does not seem to be specifically provided here who shall take in the event of there being no surviving widow, no husband, and so on.

Mr. STERLING. As the law will be amended in case this bill passes, I think the action will survive to the personal representative for the benefit of the persons named in the original act.

Mr. CLAYTON. The state law would settle that matter.

Mr. STERLING. I think not. I think the state law would have no effect in that regard, because when Congress takes cognizance of this subject it renders ineffective all state laws relating to the subject-matter; but the action would survive to the personal representative, and then the beneficiaries would be those in the order named in the original act.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. For instance, the widow, if there were a widow?

Mr. STERLING. The widow or husband and children.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. But if there were a widow and children, would the widow take all?

Mr. STERLING. No; I think not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That would depend on the state law, would it not?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The gentleman says not.

Mr. STERLING. I do not say that. I think that would depend on the law of the administration of estates in the State where the cause of action arose. That would relate to the distribution of the estate.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is exactly what I meant to say to the gentleman.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I do not think there is a particle of doubt about that.

Mr. MANN. It is not a part of the estate.

Mr. CLAYTON. The state laws governing the distribution would control.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Absolutely.

Mr. CLAYTON. That was my suggestion.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Congress has not attempted to enact anything which would control that, and it could not if it did. It has no power to.

Mr. STERLING. I did not understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] when he made his suggestion.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was unfortunate in expressing myself, perhaps, but I find that the gentleman and I agree.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What was the intention of the committee in adding the committee amendment to the language of section 1, which amendment provides that—

The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States under this act shall be concurrent with that of the courts of the several States.

Did you intend to limit the state courts in any way in this matter?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; just the contrary.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. To enlarge the power of the state courts.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the suit was brought in the state court, and the state court had original jurisdiction, would this in any way extend the jurisdiction of the federal court?

Mr. STERLING. Not at all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It does not enlarge the jurisdiction of the federal courts.

Mr. STERLING. It simply declares that the jurisdiction of the state and federal courts shall be concurrent. If the gentleman will read the brief appended to the report on this bill, I think he will be satisfied that the state court would have jurisdiction anyhow; but in view of the decision of a Connecticut state court, which dismissed a case because it held that the state court did not have jurisdiction to execute this law, this amendment was simply put in to avoid the making of such an error by any other state court.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What would be the effect in the case where a charter of a railroad was granted by a State, and a citizen of that State was injured, and brought suit against the railroad company? Would this act grant jurisdiction to the federal court to determine that case?

Mr. STERLING. If he was engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the injury it would.

Mr. MANN. That would give exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How would it be with reference to a personal injury?

Mr. STERLING. That is what I refer to. A personal injury occurring to an employee when engaged in interstate commerce could bring a suit in either the state or the federal court.

Mr. CLAYTON. And that would be the case whether we passed this particular act or not, under the act we have heretofore passed.

Mr. STERLING. I am very sure that the state courts have jurisdiction without this provision.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman means that they have jurisdiction under this act and not jurisdiction under the state law. In other words, a man engaged in interstate commerce must depend on this act. The state courts can entertain jurisdiction of this act only for his protection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then this does not enlarge the jurisdiction of the federal courts?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. This came about in this way: In all federal statutes that are passed, unless we insert words giving exclusive jurisdiction to the federal courts, the rule of construction is that under that law the jurisdiction conferred is concurrent with the state courts. Now, we felt when we passed the law in 1908 that because we left out the words "giving exclusive jurisdiction to the federal courts" we therefore conferred upon the state courts concurrent jurisdiction. But Judge Baldwin, in the Connecticut courts, said, although he recognized that principle of law, that the absence of words of exclusive jurisdiction conferred concurrent jurisdiction on the state courts, yet that Congress could confer exclusive jurisdiction on the federal courts in two ways. It could do it by express language and by necessary implication. He admitted that in that case it had not conferred it by express language, but he went on to state that because the devolution of damages recovered under this act after death was different from that provided by the statutes of Connecticut, and that, in addition thereto, this statute gave the right to bring suit against receivers which under the Connecticut statutes could not be done without permission of the courts.

He concluded that the Connecticut state courts, by reason of their different judicial machinery, being inadequate to enforce this law, generally speaking, he arrived at the conclusion that Congress intended by implication to make it exclusive in the federal courts. Therefore for the purpose of correcting that we inserted this language, which is the ordinary language that is used for this purpose in all statutes. That is all there is to it. This is to cure a defect which, in our judgment, ought not to have existed.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. I notice, in lines 18, 19, and 20, it says:

But in such cases the recovery shall be limited to compensatory damages, and there shall be only one recovery for the same injury.

Does that change the present law in reference to punitive damages?

Mr. STERLING. I do not think it changes the law as practiced in the state courts. That limitation, if it is a limitation, only applies in cases where the action survives by virtue of that section in the bill. I think that is the law now, but the committee saw fit to expressly state it.

Mr. SISSON. Regardless of whether the negligence was gross and wanton?

Mr. STERLING. That would have nothing to do with this question.

Mr. SISSON. Does not the gentleman think that the words "any right of action given by this act to a person suffering injury shall survive to his or her personal representative for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee," and so forth, would be to limit their recovery to compensatory damages? I want to ask this question: Does the federal law now limit the recovery to compensatory damages?

Mr. STERLING. I think it does. That is the law now, wherever the action is made to survive.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has explained the proviso in section 1, which provides that the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States under this act will be concurrent with that of the courts of the several States. Now, there is no question that the United States courts have jurisdiction under the liability act.

The question arose whether the state courts had jurisdiction under this liability act. So the question, in my mind, is whether the wording should not have been that the jurisdiction of the state courts should be concurrent with the jurisdiction of the United States courts.

Mr. STERLING. I think it makes no difference in the meaning of the clause whether it be stated this way or transposed. This form is the one that is generally used. It occurs in statutes frequently, and this is worded the same as in all other statutes. The effect of it is to make the jurisdiction of the federal and state courts concurrent.

Mr. SABATH. There was no question as to the jurisdiction of the federal courts?

Mr. STERLING. No.

Mr. SABATH. Why, then, should we not change the proviso and say that the state courts shall have the same jurisdiction as the federal courts have now, instead of giving the federal courts concurrent jurisdiction with the state courts, there being doubt in the minds of some of our judges whether they have jurisdiction or not? If there is any question in the minds of the state judiciary about jurisdiction under the liability act, this will not in any way clear the matter up or give them greater jurisdiction than they now maintain they have.

Mr. STERLING. I think it makes no difference at all whether it be transposed or not transposed. Its meaning is just the same. There has been only one state court that has questioned its own jurisdiction in cases under this act; and if the gentleman will read the opinion of the court in that case, I am satisfied that he will conclude the court was wrong and that state courts do have jurisdiction now.

Mr. CLAYTON. And, Mr. Speaker, if I may interrupt the gentleman, I desire to state that the committee thought that it was better to use the language here employed than the language originally embodied in the bill. The original language said:

This act shall not be construed as excluding the exercise of concurrent jurisdiction in cases arising under the act by courts of the several States.

Now, in using that language the bill seemed to lay down a rule of construction for guiding the courts. The committee thought the better practice on the part of Congress would be to declare what the rule was, not how the court should be governed in construing it. Hence the committee substituted this language:

Jurisdiction of the courts of the United States under this act shall be concurrent with that of the courts of the several States.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CLAYTON. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that I think he is mistaken that the language, "This act shall not be construed as excluding the exercise of concurrent jurisdiction" was in the original law.

Mr. CLAYTON. I did not say in the original law. I said in this bill—17263—as the bill was referred to the committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Now, this is what I want to call to the attention of the gentleman. Does the gentleman think that this clause, which is said to be already provided as amendatory to section 6, ought to be in the form of an amendment to section 6 of the original law, which is purely a clause of limitation? You have made up a section here with reference to jurisdiction, which I think ought obviously to be a separate section. What has this amendment got to do with the original section 6 of this law? It has nothing whatever.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman has propounded a question and has answered it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would like to hear from the gentleman why this section was not made an additional section instead of an amendment to section 6.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, that is a mere matter of taste. The committee thought that it would improve the efficacy of the law to make this addition here, even though the addition be put in as an amendment to section 6. That was the opinion of the committee. Now, the gentleman from Ohio thinks it does not improve the law. That is his opinion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not deny that it improves the law, but I think the Committee on the Judiciary ought to be the arbiter of good taste.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman's objection is upon another ground, and that is a mere matter of taste. He thinks it ought to be an entirely different section. Well, now, perhaps there might be something in the nicety of his conception about the matter, but it did not come before the House in that shape nor did it come before the committee in that shape, so dealing with it practically, as we have, I am willing to waive all of my ideas as to estheticism or any ideas I may have as a purist and adopt it in the practical way in which it is before us.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But I want to say to the gentleman that they have made a separate section of this other provision, and it seems to me this ought clearly to be a separate section and not an amendment to section 6.

Mr. CLAYTON. Would it not be in legal effect the same thing, whether it is a separate section or in the present section?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Well, I am inclined to think that it would, but that does not correct my objection.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman has a very keen and nice idea of the proprieties, and I appreciate it thoroughly, but the committee can not always control the tastes of the draftsmen of bills, and the committee has taken this bill as drafted and introduced and has undertaken to perfect it and put it before the House in a good and substantial and improved form, and one that we think will be an addition to the legislation of the country.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does this bill in any way enlarge the jurisdiction of the United States courts or curtail the jurisdiction of the state courts?

Mr. STERLING. It does not. It makes it much more convenient for the plaintiff to bring his suit by providing that he may sue in his own district or the defendant's district or where the injury occurred or where the defendant may be found. As the law is now, a suit can only be brought in the district where the defendant is domiciled.

Mr. WEBB. And it gives the state courts the right to administer the law.

Mr. STERLING. It expressly says they shall have concurrent jurisdiction. I think it is a unanimous opinion now, as far as I know, of the Judiciary Committee that the state courts did have jurisdiction in cases under this law.

Mr. WEBB. There has been one decision to the contrary, and this will cure it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman this question——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I desire to ask the gentleman in regard to section 9, which reads, "but in such cases the recovery shall be limited to compensatory damages." Has there ever been any other rule than that?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know of any other rule applied where the action survives.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then the rest of it reads, "and there shall be only one recovery for the same injury." Was there ever two recoveries for the same injury?

Mr. STERLING. I think, perhaps, that is superfluous, but the purpose of it is to avoid any possibility of the personal representative suing as the survivor and also suing by virtue of the original act.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did a widow ever do a thing like that?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know about that.

Mr. CLAYTON. To answer the gentleman further, no widow ever had a right to action under this sort of legislation before. This employers' liability act never was enacted before by Congress, which is now proposed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But section 9 is entirely new.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is entirely new to the employers' liability act, I think.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I might say in reply to the query of the gentleman from Missouri it will be observed first there is a right of action given to the injured person.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Now, he can bring suit in his lifetime and can recover under this provision for any pain and suffering; he can recover for humiliation; he can recover for temporary or permanent disabilities. But in the event of his death before action brought the original bill provided that there should be another and distinct right of original action given to the personal representatives for the benefit of the wife and the children and to other next of dependent kin. Now, that is as far as the original bill went, and it was discovered that there was a hiatus, that it did not provide for another possible contingency, and that was this: The man might have been injured and he might have brought suit, and after bringing suit he might have died, and he might have died after the statute had run against the substituted suit. Now, this amendment cures this defect and provides in that case for the survival of the original action; therefore there might be a time that the personal representatives would have an election to two suits. They might have an election to the original suit provided by the act or to the survival of the existing suit provided by this amendment, and that language was put in to prevent the possibility of two recoveries. Does the gentleman get that clear?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Under the law as it now stands, where an injured person brings suit and dies, does that give the survivor the right to bring suit?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. It does not permit the pending suit to survive, but it gives an original right of action to the personal representative.

Mr. MANN. I mean under the law as it existed.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. No; it does not.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a man who was injured brings a suit, and before that suit is determined he dies, but dies two years after the injury, then what happens?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Then we give by this amendment the right of survivalship of this action, and it was intended for that purpose. Without the amendment in that case the persons would be without remedy.

Mr. MANN. Where is it given in this bill?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. It is in the express words of the amendment. That is the whole purpose of it, to permit to survive the act under that condition.

Mr. MANN. The right of action shall survive, that is true. I am not sure the suit will survive.

Mr. GRAFF. To answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that the suit upon which the proceedings brought by the next of kin is based is the death of the man injured, the cause of that suit does not accrue until the death of the injured person.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Undoubtedly.

Mr. STERLING. That is true if he dies of the injury.

Mr. GRAFF. Now, if the next of kin sues on account of the death of the party, that action does not accrue until his death, and therefore the limitation in the bill does not commence to run until after his death.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The action must be brought within two years of the time of his death, not from the time the action accrued.

Mr. GRAFF. It says:

That no action shall be maintained under this act unless commenced within two years from the day the cause of action accrued.

Now, the cause of action on account of his death does not accrue until his death.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. That is a nice legal question. If the gentleman is right, there would not be any necessity for this legislation.

Mr. SIMS rose.

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield for an amendment, striking out, in line 18 and in line 19, the following language—

In such cases the recovery shall be limited to compensatory damages—

Leaving the rest of the italics in the bill?

Mr. STERLING. I am not at liberty to consent to that amendment. The committee put it in, and it simply expresses what I think the committee feels the law to be now and can do no harm there. Personally I am entirely willing for it to go out.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand the law to be as broad as you now state it in this act. Suppose the death should occur from the gross and criminal negligence and criminal carelessness of the defendant company engaged in interstate commerce. Now, in a great many of the States punitive damages will lie where the gross negligence can be proved. Are you not by this act, then, so far as it relates to interstate-commerce companies, virtually repealing every state statute which gives the right of punitive damages in those States or allows punitive damages in cases of that character?

Mr. STERLING. The state statutes are ineffective so far as they relate to suits by persons engaged in interstate commerce because this law supersedes the state law.

Mr. SISSON. Suppose, however, the jurisdiction of the court is not raised, and the matter should be tried in the state courts, and under the rules of practice and procedure, as in my State, the court could instruct the jury that if the defendant is guilty of criminal or gross negligence they might assess punitive damages?

Mr. STERLING. Well, if the suit is brought in a state court and this statute is not pleaded as a defense, I can not tell what the trial court would do in regard to it, but if it is pleaded as a defense the state law would not prevail.

Mr. SISSON. Does the language—

In such cases the recovery shall be limited to compensatory damages—

To that extent repeal all the state laws which——

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. It suspends the whole state law anyhow, not only in that respect, but in every respect.

Mr. SISSON. Would it not, then, be better legislation to amend it now, so as to preserve human life, by causing the common carrier of passengers to be more careful in the management of their trains when they know if they were guilty of gross negligence they would be punished for that gross negligence? It is not in principle for the purpose of enabling the man to recover from the railroad company for himself any more damages than he has actually suffered; but public policy and the safety of the traveling public and the safety of all the people has caused the courts in the past, as well as state legislatures, to hold that where the railroad or the interstate carrier has been criminally negligent that they may be punished for that criminal negligence, so that the public who have an interest in the safety of travel may be protected. You are depriving the courts and the citizenship of the country of that protection which has come to them under that very wise provision of law, because it is for the protection of human life and an enforcement of safe rules and regulations that punitive damages were never permitted to be recovered in any court.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill with reference to section 2, relating to jurisdiction, in which it provides that the action may be brought in the circuit court of the United States either in the district of the residence of either the plaintiff or the defendant or that in which the cause of action arises. Under that let us assume that a man was injured between the cities of Pittsburg and Philadelphia, in Pennsylvania, and his residence was in New Mexico, would he have the right, under that language, to institute proceedings in the United States court of New Mexico?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; he would.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. That is not a United States court.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Take the State of California. Suppose a man whose residence was in California suffered an injury between Philadelphia and Pittsburg, in the State of Pennsylvania, would he have the right to bring suit in a court in the district in which he resides? Does this confer jurisdiction on that court?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; it would have to be in a district where the defendant could be served.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. If it is only the intent to confer the right to sue in the district in which the defendant may be found, or in which the defendant may reside, why not strike out this language that raises all these questions and make it more explicit by saying that the action may be brought in a district in which the plaintiff resides or in which the defendant may be found?

Mr. STERLING. I think that the amendment in this bill simply provides the same rule in reference to the place of bringing suit that is provided in practically all of the States of the Union. Now, they can always, in the state courts, bring suit, as a rule, wherever the defendant can be found, and this simply gives the plaintiff the right to bring suit in a federal court where the defendant can be found.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Another question: In giving concurrent jurisdiction with a state court, let us assume that the residence of the plaintiff and the residence of the defendant were both in the city of Philadelphia. Do you believe it is wise to take from the common pleas court of the State virtually the right to try those cases?

Mr. STERLING. We do not take from the state courts the right to try these cases.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Do you not think it would unnecessarily confer upon the United States courts jurisdiction in a matter for which there is no precedent whatever?

Mr. STERLING. The plaintiff can sue in the state or federal court, as he sees fit.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. What is the necessity of giving the United States court jurisdiction in a district in which both the plaintiff and the defendant reside, and in which the plaintiff has his remedy in the courts of the State?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Suppose a case where an accident occurred from 100 to 500 miles away from the home of the plaintiff, and all the witnesses resided there. It would be a great hardship upon the plaintiff not to allow him the right to bring the action where the accident occurred and where the witnesses were present.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. And that throws light upon the very business that the gentleman has been familiar with, of bringing actions, and would impose as much hardship by bringing actions in remote places under such a change of the law, and thus compel the defendant to take his witnesses a very great distance at his very great disadvantage.

Mr. STERLING. The plaintiff is likely to bring suit where it is most convenient to him; that is, where the witnesses reside or the place of the injury. That would also be most convenient to the defendant. An injured employee ought not to be required to carry his witnesses a long distance.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What is the gentleman's opinion upon this proposition: Why should this act give concurrent jurisdiction upon both state and federal courts?

Mr. STERLING. Before the gentleman proceeds further with his question, let me say that I do not think this act does confer jurisdiction on either the state courts or the federal courts. It simply expressly says that the jurisdiction of the state and federal courts shall be concurrent.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I understand that. Now, supposing an employee engaged in interstate commerce is injured while in line of duty and brings an action and elects to bring it in the state courts. Then, supposing in his complaint he discloses the fact that the question of adverse citizenship is involved, the amount being over $2,000. Would the statute relating to the removal of cases from the state court to the federal court apply?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. It would still be in force?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. It may not be very pertinent. Referring to the last sentence in section 9, I find this language:

> And there shall be only one recovery for the same injury.

Assume that a man in the employ of a railroad is injured by the loss of a hand or arm or some other injury not fatal at the time, or apparently not fatal. He commences his action and recovers a moderate sum, a few hundred or a thousand dollars. Of course all questions that could be litigated would probably be tried in that connection. Within the statutory limit, but after the conclusion of the previous action, death results, which is directly attributable to the original injury. Would this clause in this bill bar any recovery by the next of kin?

Mr. STERLING. I think it would, without a doubt.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the gentleman think that is the law now?

Mr. STERLING. I think it is the law now; certainly in the State of Illinois, under our practice.

Mr. DAVIS. Is that the law now, according to the federal statute?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know, but I have no doubt that it is.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the gentleman think that is an equitable provision?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I think it is. I think when one suit is had on an injury of this kind, that ought to be the end of it.

Mr. DAVIS. But the original injury might be the loss of a finger, and there might be a recovery of only a few dollars; but blood poisoning might set in, which was directly attributable to this original injury. Ought the next of kin to be barred from recovery of the statutory limitation, $5,000 or $10,000, and no compensatory damages be allowed the next of kin?

Mr. STERLING. In that kind of a case the plaintiff has the right to wait until he can determine the extent of his injury. Furthermore, when he tries his case he has the right to prove what will be the probable effect of the injury, and so forth. I think he can recover then all that he is entitled to, and certainly ought not to have another action.

Mr. DAVIS. It would not, perhaps, be for the same injury, when it was for the loss of a finger or a hand. The other right of action would be for the death of the person upon whom the next of kin was dependent for support.

Mr. STERLING. It would all be from the same accident.

Mr. DAVIS. It seems to me there ought to be a further right of recovery in a case of that kind.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, this seems to me an exceedingly important measure, and unless I am greatly mistaken its full effect, if enacted into law, has not been made clear. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is not true that the effect of the first section of this bill, if it become a statute, would be to give the state courts concurrent jurisdiction, but that the law of the case would be this federal statute and not the state statute? That is correct, is it not?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In other words, the state courts would put into execution this federal statute?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; that is true without a doubt.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, the second section fixes the measure of damages, and therefore to that extent repeals any state statute on the subject of damages in actions brought to recover for the death of a person killed in an accident?

Mr. STERLING. No; this bill does not limit the recovery at all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Just a moment. It provides that in such cases the recovery shall be limited to compensatory damages.

Mr. STERLING. That is only in the case where the suit survives.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Exactly; but that will be the only law on the subject.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If there be any state statute to the contrary on the question of damages, this federal statute would repeal it.

Mr. STERLING. In the first place, I do not think there is a state statute that permits the recovery of more than compensatory damages where the suit survives. There may be, but I do not know of any.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman states that as if it were a fact, and a fact of little importance. It is, however, of fundamental, vital importance if we propose by this bill to repeal the law of damages in the different States as to compensation to be paid to a surviving widow.

Mr. STERLING. We do not limit the damages to be recovered for the benefit of the widow of all. Let us hear the statute the gentleman refers to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I read from Joyce on Damages, volume 2, chapter 26—"Death generally," and "Particular statutes:"

Paragraph 846. In Nevada the jury may give such damages, pecuniary and exemplary, as they shall deem fair and just, and may take into consideration the pecuniary injury resulting from such death. In New Mexico the jury may give such damages, compensatory and exemplary, as they shall deem fair and just, taking into consideration the pecuniary injury or injury resulting from such death.

Here are at least two States—a State and a Territory—that permit the recovery of exemplary damages. By this bill it is proposed, in effect, to repeal these respective state statutes and limit the recovery purely to compensatory damages.

Now, in paragraph 797 of the same authority, Joyce on Damages, there is a still further statement on the subject of exemplary or punitive damages:

Damages for the death—Pecuniarily suffered or sustained: The damages which are recoverable in an action for death by wrongful or negligent act are merely compensatory. No exemplary damages can be given except in these cases where there is bad motive or circumstances of aggravation which would justify punitive damages.

So, in an early Pennsylvania case the court, in its charge to the jury, directed that exemplary damages might be recovered in certain cases where the evidence showed oppression, fraud, wantonness, or reckless disregard of others' safety, and so forth, on the part of the defendant. But in the same instruction it was stated that in the case before the jury no such facts were produced.

This bill, if enacted into law, would repeal the statutes of at least two States, and I do not know but more, which permit punitive damages in certain cases of death by accident.

Mr. KEIFER. And also Ohio.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And I am informed by the gentleman from Ohio that it would also include the State of Ohio. To do this in this way strikes me as not only unusual, but as most extraordinary.

If a company engaged in interstate traffic has been warned by its employees or by the public authorities that one of its bridges or certain of its appliances or cars or portions of its roadbed are in a defective condition and the company neglects to pay attention to the warning, and by its gross negligence causes the death of one of its employees or of a number of them, it ought to be punished as provided by the statutes of the States which look to exemplary damages in cases of willful neglect of the ordinary safeguards that ought to be thrown around human life.

Mr. STERLING. I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment. Let me close, and then the gentleman can answer the whole of it. The first excerpt which I read was from a chapter dealing with the general subject of recovery of damages for death where the recovery is governed by particular statutes. It declares that ordinarily the rule permitting punitive or exemplary damages would not survive in favor of the widow or next of kin, but that the rule does exist, of course, where the legislature of a State by the exercise of its sovereign authority in a statute has expressly declared that it shall survive and gives to the jury in cases of gross negligence or of willful disregard of the law, the right to award exemplary damages.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, the statutes to which the gentleman referred have nothing whatever to do with this section of the bill relating to the survival of the action. The personal representative in his suit for the benefit of the widow and the next of kin is not limited by that clause relating to compensatory damages. The whole field of damages is open to the injured person and to his personal representative. It simply provides that where the action survives, then the damages are limited to compensatory damages. For instance, if the injured man brings a suit and dies, before judgment, from other causes than the injury, then, under this provision of the bill, the action survives to recover compensatory damages only. If he dies from the injury, the administrator has his action under the original law, and there is no limitation there on the recovery. The statutes referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin relate entirely to that kind of a case and not where the action is made by this law to survive. As I said before, however, this limitation is no limitation. That is the law now, and personally I have no objection to this committee amendment going out.

The original law gives the representative the right to bring the action, so that this clause limiting the damages to compensatory damages relates only to the case where the action survives. In that kind of a case the estate should be made whole, no more and no less, and that is what the law seeks to do now, and that is the only purpose of this clause. As I said before, it is an amendment made by the committee. I think the courts would execute the law in that way anyway, even without this clause. Personally, I think it will make no difference whatever whether that clause remains in the bill or not so far as the effect of the law is concerned in its administration by the courts.

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman has occupied one hour, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in favor of the same proposition.

Mr. MANN. He has not occupied an hour yet.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I propose to occupy a middle ground, and if the gentleman will permit I will make a brief statement.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, has my time expired?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. STERLING. Then I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin is substantially correct in effect, but it is stated in inexact language. The gentleman states that this repeals the state laws of those States that provide for punitive damages. It can not, of course, possibly repeal any state law. That is beyond the power of Congress. It supersedes that state law only so far as accidents are concerned that occur in interstate commerce.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand. I meant it nullifies, of course.

Mr. MANN. That is a distinction without a difference.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Illinois says that it is a distinction without a difference. On the contrary, he is more broadly mistaken than the gentleman from Wisconsin. That state law is in force in regard to every action brought in intrastate commerce. This act does not affect either its breadth or its scope at all; it merely takes from under its operation suits regarding accidents in interstate commerce. It suspends it in this particular only as long as this act or some other federal act is in operation.

Now, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is entirely correct in regard to that, that in the class of cases enumerated under this amendment compensatory damages alone can be recovered, and I think I am right in stating that not only under the statutes of the States providing for punitive damages, but under the common law exemplary or punitive damages may be recovered for gross negligence and almost criminal acts of carelessness on the part of the defendant. Therefore, I repeat, the gentleman is entirely correct in his criticisms, and if I may be permitted I want to state that the consideration upon which it was placed in the bill by the committee might very easily be waived. We were influenced in putting it on by the fear that after a man was dead his widow could recover for his pain, his suffering, his anguish of mind, and his humiliation as a result of that accident, and we felt that that was not necessary or just, but that damages against the railroad company in the action by the personal representative should be limited entirely to compensation. My own conviction is that all of those—I mean pain, suffering, humiliation, and loss of earning power—are compensatory damages alone to the man injured. My own conviction is, indeed, I know the fact to be true, that no statute in the land gives in express language damages for pain and suffering. The court says this is a part of the compensation that is due to the injured man.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Not in face of the words.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask this question relative to a matter which I think has puzzled a good many of us: If a suit is brought for injury and that suit asked not only ordinary damages but punitive damages, the law permits it; but if the man dies, not from the injury, and it becomes necessary to revive the suit in the name of his personal representative, then, according to your provision, you do not permit the recovery to carry with it punitive damages?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. That is right.

Mr. SHERLEY. If it was right in the first place to have punitive damages, why is it not right in the second case? The reason for punitive damages is not simply compensation to the individual, but punishment to the defendant for his negligence; and if punitive damages should be allowed in the first place, it should be allowed where the case is revived by the personal representative.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman will not take me off the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the previous question.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have ten minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for twenty minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I want ten minutes of that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended twenty minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection if I be allowed ten minutes.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I shall not occupy more than ten minutes.

Mr. STERLING. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Now, in order to get directly and pointedly to the question under consideration, I want to state I believe that the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Wisconsin are entirely right. I believe, in other words, that the reason for which we put on that limitation does not exist in law now. I believe there is no danger of a widow being allowed to recover for pain and suffering endured by her injured husband, because that is compensation to the man injured and is not an element of damages in a substituted or survived action, and is not compensation to the widow when she sues in her representative right, but this provision in the proposed amendment limiting the damages to compensation alone does eliminate altogether the right to recover punitive damages, which is and ought to be an essential and important element of damages in some cases.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has properly said that in an action for negligence the imposition of damages has two objects. It not only tends to compensate the person injured, but it has the further object to inflict punitive and exemplary damages when the evidence shows that the injury arose from gross, inexcusable, or you might say, criminal negligence on the part of the defendant. Now, I believe under this amendment the widow or her personal representative could not recover for pain and suffering if the words objected to were eliminated. It is not necessary to put in any language for that purpose, and the attempt to insert them for that purpose will accomplish a very unfortunate limitation. Therefore, I am free to say, though in this respect I may differ from other members of the committee, that it would probably improve the bill if the words "limiting recovery to compensatory damages only" should be omitted.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to interfere with proper amendments to the employers' liability act, and after listening for some time to the colloquy here this morning and the statements made pro and con as to these amendments, I think in some respects the proposition to amend that act is better than the gentlemen in charge of the bill claim it is and in some respects worse. I have no objection to the first proposition; that is, that there may be a statute of limitation within which actions may be brought under the act.

I think it will turn out in practice to complicate the whole employers' liability act if the next clause under section 6 is enacted into law: This provides:

> Under this act an action may be brought in a circuit court of the United States in the district of the residence of either the plaintiff or the defendant, or in which the cause of action arose, or in which the defendant shall be found at the time of commencing such action.

There is no attention given here to providing how jurisdiction is to be acquired in cases where the defendant does not reside in the district where suit is brought. If a suit is brought in a federal court district in which, under existing law, service of summons upon the defendant can not be made, there is nothing here indicating how jurisdiction over the defendant is to be acquired. If the plaintiff chooses to bring the suit in the federal district in which he resides and can not serve the party, there will be trouble experienced at once. If he undertakes to go to the scene where the cause of action arose, he may meet the same difficulty. But I think this is a matter which will lead to great confusion and will operate to prejudice rather than to promote the efficacy of the act.

Then we come to an extraordinary provision of the same section, contained in the closing sentence of it, as follows:

> The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States under this act shall be concurrent with that of the courts of the several States.

I have no recollection that any attempt before has been made of this character since about 1849. The old fugitive-slave law—I mean the one of 1793—undertook to confer jurisdiction on state justices of the peace in executing that law, but finally it was held, by various holdings in state courts, and it was finally held by the federal courts of the United States and the Supreme Court, that there could be no such thing as conferring jurisdiction upon state courts by a law of Congress, and there was then adopted the policy of conferring jurisdiction under the fugitive-slave act upon federal commissioners. No attempt to define and fix the jurisdiction of state courts has since been made. It is proposed in this bill to confer jurisdiction on state courts by an act of Congress.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Well, let me say that the reason is given for this in the report of the committee. (Reading from the report:)

> It is proposed to further amend the act by making the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States "concurrent with the courts of the several States."
> This is proposed in order that there shall be no excuse for courts of the States to follow in the error of the supreme court of errors of Connecticut in the case of Hoxie v. New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company (73 Atlantic Rep., 754).

This is the reason given in the committee's report for undertaking to fasten upon the courts of Connecticut in the future, and the courts of other States, a jurisdiction not given by the constitution and laws of the States.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I understand the gentleman to say it is a very new, unusual, and unconstitutional thing to attempt to give concurrent jurisdiction to the state courts under an act of Congress?

Mr. KEIFER. I did not say that. I said it was a very old attempt, and that it had failed, to undertake to give jurisdiction by an act of Congress to state courts.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that the act of 1789 did create the circuit court and convey to it all the jurisdiction under the laws and under the Constitution of the United States and contained this language, "concurrent with the state courts," and it has been the law ever since?

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman has gone clear away from the question. The jurisdiction act of 1789 only fixed the jurisdiction of the United States courts "concurrent with the state courts," and not to confer jurisdiction, as does this bill, on state courts. We are undertaking here with a special act to give concurrent jurisdiction to courts, both federal and state, over the latter of which we have no control, so far as its jurisdiction over subject-matter and over persons is concerned.

But I must pass on. I think now when we come to section 9 of the amendment, in the main it is all right, except I dissent from it, as explained by the gentleman in charge of it. He undertakes to say what I do not think will be the effect of it; that if there was a recovery in an action of this kind on behalf of the estate of some person who was injured and who died, that that would be a bar to a recovery by the widow or next of kin in either state or federal court in an action to recover for the death of that party. Now, let me say that I think the section only undertakes to provide that the cause of action which accrued to the injured person survived on his death, and that it does not have anything to do with the cause of action that might arise in behalf, on the various statutes of States, of the widow and next of kin. Therefore that the recovery on a primary action brought by the employee who was injured would be no bar of an action that was of a different kind or class which accrued to other persons than the injured, and there should be none. Let me say, further, that this is a provision to amend what is called the "employers' liability act." That act in its scope nowhere gives jurisdiction to anybody to sue to recover damages but the injured party; and this amendment, I think, is all right, though perhaps not in very good language. This amendment is intended to continue the right of action which accrued to the injured party and to have it survive to his estate. Should he die his rights are fully settled. It would not survive to the widow. It would not survive under this proposed amendment to the widow or next of kin. It would survive to the legal representatives, administrators, or executors in the settlement of estates.

Mr. STERLING. That is what this bill expressly provides.

Mr. KEIFER. But when you undertake to say that it is to operate as a bar to the recovery under other statutes of States of an entirely different character, then that is a mistake, in my opinion, and in that respect the bill, I think, fairly construed, is better than it has been explained to be. The bill should be amended so as to allow a recovery of such damages, compensatory or exemplary, as has been usual in like cases by a long line of decisions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been my misfortune to have to differ with the great Committee on the Judiciary of this House all along the line about the employers' liability act. I stated four reasons in four minutes on the floor of this House in the Fifty-ninth Congress against the then employers' liability act, and I believe I was the only man on the floor here or in the Senate that voted against it. The case went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court held that three of the reasons mentioned by me were good in declaring the act unconstitutional. When we came to pass the present act I went to and badgered the members of the committee to let me make some corrections of it, and I was refused that privilege. But when the bill passed the House and passed the Senate and went to the President, he was told by those in whom he had confidence that unless my suggested amendment to that bill was put in it would be unconstitutional, and the committee came back here and had passed a resolution amending the bill through the enrolling committee.

Mr. MANN. Will my colleague allow me to ask unanimous consent?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that I may be permitted to offer an amendment, to strike out, in lines 18 and 19, page 2, the words "the recovery shall be limited to compensatory damages, and," so that the committee amendment will read: "but in such cases there shall be only one recovery for the same injury."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment?

Mr. MANN. I do, without taking the gentleman off the floor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STERLING. I do not object.

Mr. MANN. Then I offer the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "the recovery shall be limited to compensatory damages, and," so that the committee amendment will read: "but in such cases there shall be only one recovery for the same injury."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion before he concludes?

Mr. STERLING. I will yield for a question.

Mr. SULZER. Has the amendment been adopted?

Mr. MANN. No; but it will have to be voted upon.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I want a minute or two of debate, if you please. I wish to present just one point.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be voted upon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois may be voted upon now.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the consent of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to say a word before he presses the motion.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; but you will have to ask my colleague for the time.

Mr. STERLING. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. About three minutes.

Mr. STERLING. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I shall ask that you have more time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. STERLING. I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not think I will require it all. In addition to the quotations which I read a moment ago I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the same authority—Joyce on Damages, under the caption of "Death, general and other statutes"—and to a provision of the statutes of still another State, the State of Washingon. It is given here in quotation marks:

The jury may give such damages, pecuniary or exemplary, as under all the circumstances of the case may seem to them just.

Mr. STERLING. Let me say in reply to that, I think that statute is very general throughout the States. But you will find no statute in my judgment where it simply provides that the action shall survive in the estate providing that it shall recover.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is no reason why the action should not so survive if the employee is killed in an accident resulting from the company's criminal negligence.

Mr. STERLING. The general statutes do not relate to that which is provided in this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It relates to it exactly, and the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in effect so admitted when he said that the objection was scarcely in point.

The statute of the Territory of New Mexico, as does the statute of Nevada, provides for recovery in case of death. It does not say instantaneous death nor death after weeks of suffering. It provides simply for recovery for death, whether instantaneous or lingering, from injury occasioned by negligence, unskillfulness, or criminal intent of any officer or agent of a railroad company, stagecoach, or public conveyance; and it provides also that the damages may be either compensatory or exemplary, in the discretion of the jury.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman believe that the law would allow exemplary damages to the next of kin?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Undoubtedly; where the statute says that such damages may be awarded them.

Mr. KEIFER. Where the common law does that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think that in a case where the gross carelessness of a railroad company results in the killing of an employee there ought not to be recovery of such damages?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I can only speak definitely as to the law of my own State.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It depends on the statute.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not think under the law of my State that exemplary damages could be awarded to the next of kin.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MANN. I renew my request that the vote on amendment may be taken by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment of Mr. MANN was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I call for a vote on the bill.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

GENESEE AND SHIAWASSEE COUNTIES, MICH.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 18594) to detach the counties of Genesee and Shiawassee from the northern division of the eastern judicial district of Michigan and attach them to the southern division of the eastern judicial district of Michigan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the counties of Genesee and Shiawassee, in the State of Michigan, be detached from the northern division of the eastern judicial district of the State of Michigan and attached to and made a part of the southern division of said judicial district.

SEC. 2. That all process against persons resident in said counties of Genesee and Shiawassee and cognizable before the court in said judicial district shall be issued out of and made returnable to said court in the said southern division, and that all prosecutions against persons for offenses committed in said counties shall be tried in the court of the said southern division: Provided, That no civil or criminal cause begun and pending prior to the passage of this act shall be in any way affected by it.

Mr. TIRRELL. I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL].

Mr. GOEBEL. The object of this bill is to detach the counties of Genesee and Shiawassee from the northern division of the eastern judicial district of Michigan and attach them to the southern division of the eastern judicial district of that State.

It appears from the evidence before the Committee on the Judiciary that the two counties referred to are populous and important counties, and that it will be more convenient to all concerned to have the business of those two counties transacted at Detroit, where the United States district court is almost constantly in session, rather than at Bay City, which is visited by the court but twice a year, and then for a few days only. The distance of these counties from Detroit is only a little greater than that to Bay City. This bill has the approval of the Attorney-General, the district judge, the district attorney, and the marshal.

I ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill, but in the interest of expediting the business of the House I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who has charge of the measure, that we have some agreement now about the time to be occupied in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that two hours and a half be devoted to debate, that at the expiration of that time the previous question be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman does not make any provision as to the division of time.

Mr. TIRRELL. I intended to ask also that one-half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the proposition. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this bill be closed in two hours and a half, one-half of which time is to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and one-half by himself, and that at the expiration of two hours and a half the previous question be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments to the final passage.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, let me have this understanding clear with the gentleman from Massachusetts. It is the purpose of seven of the minority to offer an amendment known as "section 14" to the bill looking to a repeal of the bankruptcy law, to be effective two years hence.

Mr. TIRRELL. It is understood that that opportunity will be afforded.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is understood that I may have an opportunity to offer the amendment and have a vote on it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, in order to make that clear, I suggest a modification of the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that it be now in order for the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] to offer his amendment; that debate shall continue for two and one-half hours, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama, and at the expiration of that time the previous question shall be ordered on the bill and amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama to its final passage.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, there is no essential difference between the proposition stated by the gentleman from Kentucky and the proposition stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I shall offer the amendment as soon as it is in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky suggests a modification, which is that the gentleman from Alabama, by unanimous consent, shall offer his amendment now.

Mr. CLAYTON. I prefer the agreement entered into between the gentleman from Massachusetts and myself, that I may offer the amendment at any time.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no objection to that. The gentleman can offer it now or at the conclusion of the two and one-half hours' debate. But I want it understood that at the expiration the previous question is to apply to the bill and to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the proposition again. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all debate shall close upon this bill at the expiration of two and one-half hours, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and one-half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL], and that at any time the gentleman from Alabama may offer his amendment to repeal the section referred to; and at the close of the two hours and a half the previous question shall operate upon the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, in order that the House may thoroughly understand the attitude of the minority in relation to this matter, I will yield to the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky and ask unanimous consent that I may offer now and have pending as a new section to the bill my amendment known as "section 14," which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, after the words "and six," in line 8, add the following new section:

"SEC. 14. That the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved July 1, 1898, and all acts amendatory thereof, including the act approved February 15, 1903, and the act approved June 15, 1906, and this act, are hereby repealed, but this repeal shall not be operative until the expiration of two years from the date of the approval of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that has been stated?

There was no objection.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration is substantially the same bill that passed the House by a large majority in the second session of the Sixtieth Congress, except that some two or three paragraphs have been rewritten so that they are more intelligible and definite. Of course it often happens in the construction of a legislative act that that which would appear clear to strong, logical, intellectual minds when put into actual practice creates contingencies which the law, as it apparently reads, does not properly meet. And so, to avoid any misunderstanding, although no new act has been put in here different from the one passed by the last Congress, some of the paragraphs have been rewritten.

I do not understand that there is any opposition to these amendments. I do understand, however, that there is opposition to the continuance of the bankruptcy law. There always has been, and I presume there always will be, depending upon the view which we take of the proper functions of the federal and state government. Therefore in what I shall say I shall not go over this bill in detail, but leave it to the sponsor of the bill, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], to explain its various provisions.

As far as the matter of the change of the bill from that in the last Congress is concerned, perhaps one illustration alone may be permitted. The question of receivers' fees was left in an ambiguous way. Now it is definite. The bill is so framed that there are two sorts of receivers recognized. One you may call the "holding receiver" and the other the "active receiver" of the bankrupt estate. The holding receiver, who performs precisely the same duty that a trustee performs, holding the property intact to be afterwards disposed of, receives the same compensation that a trustee receives for doing the same work.

Then there is an active receivership, where the receiver must carry on a going business, where it requires skill and intelligence and experience in that particular line of business. It is recognized that an active receiver carrying on such responsible duties is entitled to a larger compensation than a mere holding receiver or a trustee of a bankrupt estate. This bill is so framed that an active receiver shall receive substantially double the amount of a holding receiver, but the amount is specified. It is double the amount that a trustee would receive for doing his ordinary duties, on account of the extraordinary duties that the active receiver performs.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why could not the ordinary receiver be an active receiver at the same time?

Mr. TIRRELL. Well, that leads up to an examination and discussion of a feature of the bill that is not really in controversy here. While the active receiver is allowed double the amount that a holding receiver or a trustee receives, the court, in its discretion, if it deems that too much, can award less.

My statement in regard to the matter of receiverships illustrates what this bill contemplates accomplishing, namely, the simplification and clearing up of obscurities which have resulted by different decisions of the courts as they have occurred from time to time. I come now to the consideration of the objections to a bankruptcy bill, which will be the main subject of controversy, as I apprehend, before the House this afternoon. I think in many respects it is owing to a misapprehension of what the bankrutpcy bill was intended to accomplish from the time of its origin down to the present day. Bankruptcy bills were first created in the reign of Henry VIII.

In 1542 the first bankruptcy law was enacted. That law was intended to meet the case of fraudulent and absconding bankrupts. It was intended by the act of King Henry VIII that fraudulent and absconding debtors should not be able to gather together the fruits of their iniquitous conduct, flee the country, and thereby prevent equitable distribution of their estates. There was no discharge for the debtor. He was left helpless. The only object of that law was to attain property which had been fraudulently acquired or fraudulently disposed of and distribute it among the creditors, to whom it belonged, and the debtor was left to his own resources, to struggle along in life as best he might. There was no change in that law until nearly two hundred years had passed away, when, in 1705, in the reign of Queen Anne, there was then inserted a provision in the bankruptcy law by which the bankrupt could be discharged, provided an examination had shown that he had been honest in the administration of his estate and had surrendered all his property and complied with all the provisions of the law. There was even then no voluntary bankruptcy permitted, and there was not a suggestion of voluntary bankruptcy under the English jurisprudence until 1828, when it first became a provision of the English law. If you will take up a history of bankruptcy in this country, you will find that it follows along the same line. The first bankruptcy law, in 1800, did not provide that the bankrupts should be discharged.

The only object sought then was the object sought under the English jurisprudence; namely, that there should be by that law a just and equitable distribution of the bankrupt's estate. That law, it is true, had but a short life. It was annulled in less than four years. It must be remembered that it never had any trial whatever to see whether it had merits or defects. Those were the days when the country was sparsely settled; when men had to travel hundreds of miles to reach a federal court; when a journey would be necessitated perhaps from Boston to Washington, which would take fourteen days to accomplish, in order to have the benefit of the federal court in matters of this sort. Those were the days of the sedition laws and the alien laws, and this bankruptcy law, then enacted, mixed up with those other laws which were in public disrepute, failed to have any trial. Interstate commerce was then of insignificant proportions. Credits were confined to local areas, where the people could reach each other, and there was no call for a national law. No proceedings were instituted under it of any account, and therefore it fell by the wayside. It was not until 1841 that bankruptcy really had any sort of test, and even then not much of a one, to determine whether it was a meritorious proposition. In 1841 a law was passed which contained many of the features which had been developed by a sort of evolution through three or four hundred years, which is the basis to-day of bankruptcy proceedings, because that law then provided not only for the equitable distribution of a bankrupt's estate, but also provided that the bankrupt himself, being honest, should be discharged from his debts. The law recognized the justice, for the first time in American jurisprudence, that the debtor, as well as the creditor, could invoke its aid. Voluntary bankruptcy was permitted, thus enabling the honest debtor to extricate himself from his embarrassments and start again unhandicapped by the burden of hopeless debts.

I ought also to say that that law in the days of "Tippecanoe and Tyler too," when the country was rent from one end to the other with political excitement and when administrations were changing after short tenure, had no opportunity to determine its merits. It was repealed soon after it was enacted, and so it passed away, and we come down to the law of 1867.

The law of 1867 is substantially the insolvency law of Massachusetts. It was based upon that law, but instead of having the economical features of the Massachusetts law, it entailed such costs and such expenses and necessitated such travel to distant courts that after awhile there arose a prejudice against it for those reasons largely, and after eleven years' trial it ceased to be the law of the land. My recollection is that in those days the fees were so excessive that registers became fairly rich who had any considerable bankruptcy business, and that to prove a claim, no matter if it was no more than $5—the amount was immaterial—it took $1, and you had to go before magistrates, and there was an accumulation of fees all along the line. The law was an excellent one in its general features, but died by reason of the costs imposed upon the poor people, by the difficulty of administrating it, and by the fact that the country was practically cleaned up from bankruptcy and had started upon eras of prosperity, so that there did not seem to be a necessity for the continuance of the law any further at that particular time. Briefly summarized, that law made it too easy to throw a debtor into bankruptcy, too hard for him to obtain his discharge, and it was too costly both for the debtor and creditor.

Now, the present law, enacted in 1898, is universally admitted to have obviated the objections that have been urged against other bankruptcy laws. It contains their merits. It affords an efficient and economical administration of the bankrupt's affairs. It insures a just distribution of his assets. It secures fair play to the bankrupt and seems to have met every requirement, as well as every objection, which has been raised relative to previous laws. The present law, as well as previous laws, has had these two things in mind. The first thing in mind has been in the beginning always, and it is paramount to-day, a just and equitable and square distribution of the assets of the bankrupt. The main provisions of every bankruptcy law are to provide means and methods by which fraud can be prevented and fraudulent conveyances nullified, so that the estate of the bankrupt can be gathered together where it has been improperly placed out of his hands and distributed among the creditors. The creditors ought to have it, as they have themselves created it. Now, then, as illustrative, I quote from the opinion of Justice Miller in Wilson v. Bank (84 U. S., 473), where he says:

> The primary object of a bankruptcy law is to secure a just distribution of the bankrupt's property among his creditors. The secondary object is the release of the bankrupt from the obligation to pay his debts.

United States District Attorney Ray, who was on the Judiciary Committee of this House, when the present bankruptcy law was enacted and who also was the author of what is known as the "Ray amendment," which passed Congress in 1903, says in regard to the same matter:

> The main purpose of the bankruptcy law is to prevent preference and to secure a fair and equitable division of the bankrupt's estate among his creditors, not to grant discharges. This end accomplished, the bankrupt is granted a discharge from all his debts.

That is and always has been the purpose since the first English statute was enacted. It is true that in the course of time an equitable distribution of the bankrupt's estate had perhaps become no more important than the second object, namely, the discharge of the honest debtor. We may say that they are upon a par now, but we never would have had any enactment whatever if it had not been for the first and main object of bankruptcy to lawyers—to roll up little bills and a large amount of costs, sometimes exceeding the bill itself. Do you not believe that where bankruptcy does not intervene that there will be more chances taken, more desperate suits, more and more costs piled up than could possibly be done under any contingency you can imagine where the trustee, having the supervision of all the assets of the estate, takes out those claims which are collectible, upon which there is a justification for him to bring suit, and bring it only on them, instead of wasting the money of the estate by fruitless suits, running chances as to whether he makes the collection or not? Therefore this charge that the bankruptcy act is a collecting act, for collecting purposes, has no foundation, I submit, in actual practice. The collecting agencies are outside of bankruptcy, and before a man files his petition in bankruptcy the cost and expenses which have been rolled up diminish the assets to which I just referred. Now, then, what are the objections which have been and will be urged against the bankruptcy law? I take it that there will be no objection to these few amendments, which do not change the law and only illuminate it and make it plainer. The attack this afternoon will, as I conceive it, not be against this bill, but will be against bankruptcy as an act to remain upon the statutes of the United States.

I think that the quotations which I have read and the references which I have made to this legislation show that there is a sort of misconception as to the purposes of bankruptcy and also, I think, misinformation in regard to what the law has accomplished. We shall hear objections made that bankruptcy was designed primarily and is intended now to be for the relief of unfortunate debtors. That is one of its objects now, but I have shown by legislation in this country and in England that it was not the original object. It never has been the primary object, but an incidental object until now perhaps as important as any. Therefore there is legislation along these lines for the relief of unfortunate debtors, in connection, however, with administrative methods to enforce a more just, economical, and speedy marshaling of a debtor's assets, the prevention of fraud, the recovery of preferences, and the distribution of assets among the creditors. It will be said that bankruptcy is a collecting agency, and a more unpleasant agency than ordinary methods of collection.

Now, as a matter of fact, do we not know, those of us who have had bankruptcy practice, that when an estate goes into bankruptcy there are very few debts to collect anyway? The debtor secures all the debts that are collectible before he files his petition. He does not leave any debtor of his to hold money that belongs to him while he is becoming more and more straitened in his circumstances. He resorts to every honest expedient, and sometimes dishonest expedients, in order to force from the debtor what is due him, in order that he might have the wherewithal to keep along in business for a while longer.

The debts which a trustee has to collect on a bankrupt estate amount to comparatively little, usually none at all, for the reason that I have stated. Even if that were not so, do you not think that in bankruptcy under a trustee it is much more economical for him to marshal the assets and collect the debts than it would be for creditors in different States to bring suits, to pile up costs of courts, whereby the creditors must suffer if there is anything collected or anything left after the collection? It is alleged that bankrupt laws eat up the assets in expenses. That may be true, to some extent, of former laws, but certainly not of this. On the contrary, the present law conserves the estate by setting aside fraudulent conveyances, annuls preferences to favored debtors, breaks up the securities by which neighbors and friendly creditors get their debts substantially liquidated, gives a square deal to all, and encourages commercial activity, no matter how distant the creditor and debtor may be. The very fact that all are on an equality and these things not permitted gives confidence to the trade and secures an honest business conduct of it. So also it enhances trade, for by this law it is kept within proper bounds. The per cent paid in bankruptcy is often small, for obvious reasons, but often even that would not be left unless there was a national law under which only it could be obtained and equitably distributed.

Now, outside of these propositions—that bankruptcy is simply for the relief of unfortunate debtors, that it is an agency for the collection of debts, and that it eats up the assets in costs and expenses—I fail to have discovered, in reading the remarks that have been made from time to time in the Congress of the United States by those opposed to a bankruptcy act, any substantial reason why the act should be annulled; and those reasons which have been alleged are founded neither upon suppositions sustained by facts nor the enactment of any law upon this subject whatever.

The truth of the matter is that for an economical method of administering an estate there never has been an act more economical than this one which is the law to-day. The fees are very low and they are fixed by law. If the unfortunate debtor is unable to pay the fees of the court he then, by filing a proper affidavit, is exempt from all fees. What more can we ask of him? Those who are entitled to the fees where they are not absolutely fixed by the law come under the jurisdiction of the court and are limited in a general way as to the amount that they may be allowed. Every feature almost seems to have been properly carried in the law which is now upon the statute books. There is no complaint, certainly in all the northern tier of the United States, from the business men of this country of every kind, class, or description against the continuance of the bankruptcy law. On the contrary, if it should be thought for a moment that the bankruptcy law was liable to be repealed, that such was apparently the sentiment of Congress, we should be inundated by petitions of all the various lines of business throughout this country protesting against such action. Nor is it for the interest of the people of different States that this law should be wiped away. What constitutes the price at which the man sells his goods? You take the great shoe manufacturing industry of Massachusetts which sends down to Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas hundreds of salesmen every year to dispose of their goods, and what fixes the price of those goods? The law which regulates the manner in which business can be carried on and an estate distributed.

You wipe away the bankruptcy law and the shoe manufacturer of Massachusetts will consider the additional risk he runs under the state laws, which give preferences, where friends and relatives can be favored, where he can not ascertain, being so far away, what the financial condition of the debtor may be. He will, as sure as fate, place upon the price of his goods an amount sufficient to indemnify him against the additional risk which he suffers, and thereby the price of his goods will be enhanced to the retail customer.

Therefore his prices will be higher than ordinarily at places near by, where he could become informed about these things which never could be when his customer is two or three thousand miles away, where there is no one upon the ground to look after his interest, and when there is every opportunity to make preferences. Under those circumstances he would be compelled to think that he would be left out in the cold. Therefore he must secure such prices for his goods as will compensate him for the risk that he is running. So I say, it is not only for the benefit of the customer at home but the customer hundreds of miles away, when you analyze the real condition between the seller and the buyer. There should be uniformity throughout the country, under which there will be an equitable distribution of the bankrupt's property whereby he may not be able to give preferences to relatives and friends, so that the near-by creditor can not be given a preference over the creditor far away, who has possibly furnished nine-tenths of the capital upon which the debtor has been working. He should be put in the same situation as those who are on the ground, so that he can receive equal privileges.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time, and I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. NYE). The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, before that request is put, I ask to amend the request by asking unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on this measure to-day may have unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. For how long?

Mr. CLAYTON. I should say for five legislative days.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is upon the subject?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is upon this pending measure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen speaking on this measure to-day shall have leave to print for five legislative days. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask how much time the gentleman from Massachusetts has consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed thirty minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Thirty minutes of the hour and a quarter allowed to that side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the assertion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts in the outset of his remarks. He, in effect, said that he assumed that there was no opposition to the pending bill, which is amendatory of the bankruptcy act and the acts amendatory of the original act. For one, Mr. Speaker, I oppose this particular measure, and I shall vote against it. But I do not at this time desire to address myself to the consideration of the defects or vices embodied in the pending bill. I shall reserve that, if opportunity is afforded, for a later time in this discussion. At this time, I may say, Mr. Speaker, I am in thorough accord with certain members of the Committee on the Judiciary. Seven of us of that committee, without reference to this pending measure, favor the repeal of the bankrupt law. In other words, that minority of this committee—not all confined to partisan lines—is opposed to the longer retention of the bankrupt law as a part of the permanent system of our country.

Mr. Speaker, in pursuance of that idea, and in accordance with the opposition, I have offered here an amendment which was agreed upon by the seven of us in accord in opposition to this measure and which has been read at the Clerk's desk. Since that amendment to the bill was offered, which seeks the repeal of the bill, effective two years from now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KELIHER] suggests than an embarrassing situation might arise at the end of that two years mentioned in the amendment unless some specific provision was made for cases then pending in bankruptcy. Yielding to that suggestion, and after a brief conference with those who agree with me in opposition to the retention of the bankrupt law, I have drawn the following amendment to the amendment, which I ask to be considered as part of the amendment that I will be allowed to offer and which is in line with the amendment, and if Members will listen they will have no objection to it. I ask unanimous consent that it may be added to the amendment which I sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the proposed amendment the following:

"Provided, That the repeal of said act and amendatory acts shall not affect proceedings in bankruptcy pending at the time when this repealing clause or act becomes operative."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as pending.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, what further remarks I have to make on this subject I will reserve for later along in the discussion, and I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia, my colleague on the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. BRANTLEY.]

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the limited time I shall consume in this discussion I shall not concern myself with the various amendments to the present bankruptcy law that are incorporated in the pending bill. So far as I have read and considered these amendments, they appear, in the main, to tend toward the cure of some of the evils and objections that exist in connection with the enforcement of the existing law, and I therefore have no quarrel with them. I believe, however, that there is no amendment that can remove all the evils, all the wrongs, and all the injustices that this law permits save the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] at the instance of a minority of the Judiciary Committee, in which is proposed a repeal of the entire bankruptcy law, root and branch.

Mr. Speaker, I can not hope to illumine a debate that has been going on periodically since the formation of our Government, and longer in other countries of the world—a debate that has dealt with all phases of bankruptcy laws. There is nothing new on the subject of bankruptcy laws that I can state. I can state my conviction, and that is that a bankruptcy law is a standing invitation to dishonesty, that it is an incentive to fraud, that it results in failures that would not otherwise occur, and that for these reasons it is a law that ought not to be tolerated in this or any other country save, perhaps, in times of widespread financial distress.

My objection to a bankruptcy law is fundamental. There can be no quarrel with anyone upon the proposition that Congress has the constitutional power to enact it. My contention is with those only who insist that this law should remain permanently on our books as one of our standing laws, to be in force from day to day and from year to year for all time. I dissent from that proposition. In my judgment, one of the wisest clauses in the Constitution of this country—one that means more for honesty and uprightness—is the clause that forever prohibits any State from passing any law impairing the obligations of contracts. No State can pass what is really and truly a bankruptcy law, because no State can pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract.

I am one of those who believe that men should pay their debts, that they should live up to their obligations, and that they should not be relieved from them unless some real necessity or some real cause exists for such relief. I believe in this as a moral principle and as a sound governmental principle.

It is inconceivable to me that the framers of our Constitution, restricting as they did the power of the State to impair the obligations of contracts, ever meant or intended that there should permanently remain on our statute books a law that not only permits the impairment, but actually wipes out and destroys the obligations of contracts from one end of this country to the other. The fact that the Constitution confers upon Congress the power to declare war is no more persuasive of the proposition that Congress must keep our country continually at war than that the power given to enact a bankruptcy law is conclusive that Congress must always keep in force a bankruptcy law.

If we look back at the history of our bankruptcy laws, we must conclude that the very thought I suggest has ever been in the minds of our lawmakers.

The first bankruptcy law we had was in 1800. It was repealed in 1803. We did not have another until 1841, and this law did not go into effect until 1842, and then was repealed in 1843 by the very Congress that enacted it. No other bankruptcy law was enacted until 1867, and it was repealed in 1878.

Following this law of 1867 there was an interim of twenty years when we had no bankruptcy law. The present law was enacted in 1898 and has lived longer than any other, and it seems to me that whatever may have been the motive or purpose of its original enactment, that purpose has been subserved and the time has come for its repeal.

I did not rise to do more than state a few propositions upon which I base my judgment upon this question. It is not a question of constitutional power; it is not a question of partisan politics. It is a question for the individual responsibility and judgment of each Member here, and I act upon my own judgment and for myself.

Mr. Speaker, a bankruptcy law derives no force or power by reason of the commerce clause of the Constitution. It goes into a State and takes charge of commercial transactions in winding up a business that is purely intrastate, a power that the commerce clause could not confer.

It is conceded by all that in the absence of a national bankruptcy law the State can enact and enforce insolvent laws. This is both an insolvent and a bankruptcy law and repeals all state insolvency laws. It goes further than the state laws can go, because it relieves a man from his obligation, in his State and out of his State, to pay. Every man here or elsewhere who has ever engaged in the business of extending credit knows that in extending such credit he was never controlled and influenced solely by the amount of property that a man owned at the time the credit was asked. There is always a moral risk that is considered in extending credit. Credit has been given and is given to men who have youth and strength and who are believed to have honesty, even though they have little or no property. They are given credit upon the faith that they have earning capacity and power and that their future earnings will enable them to pay.

Here is a law, however, under which, after what little property a man had at the time of receiving credit is exhausted, relieves him from all obligation to appropriate to the payment of his debts his future earnings, upon which the credit was actually extended to him. I am opposed to retaining permanently upon the statutes of this country any such law.

Mr. Speaker, a man in my State may get credit from this grocer and this dry goods merchant, from this man and that man, all residing in his community, and although the State has not and would not allow him to defraud these people by wiping out all of his debts for him, here is a law of the United States that comes into my State and supersedes its laws and enables this man to perpetrate that fraud. This is an injustice and wrong to the honest people of my State that ought not to continue any longer than some great public necessity requires.

Again, we have in my State a system of laws; we have our duly constituted judges, learned in the law; we have courts in which 12 jurors are required to make a verdict; and I am opposed to keeping permanently on the statutes of this country a law that effaces these laws, judges, and jurors, and substitutes therefor this law and one man, a referee, and he not always chosen from among the best lawyers in the community in which he serves. I am willing, so far as I am concerned, in a time of great public stress, such as we have had, to have a bankruptcy law to enable the downtrodden and oppressed creditor in the midst of public calamity to wipe out and start over, but I am not willing to permanently retain such a law. It has never heretofore been thought wise to retain it for any great length of time, and no argument has been submitted that satisfies me it is wise and proper now to make such a law permanent.

I know of but two classes who in the main are really insistent upon the retention of this law. I cast no reflection upon either of them; one class is made up of the credit men's associations, who have the idea that this law, through its insolvency features, not its bankruptcy features, through its being a national collection law, not a bankruptcy law, is a good thing for them. They feel and believe that this law, wiping out as it does all of the collection laws and insolvency laws of all the States, makes their work and labor easier and lighter. They say they have but one law to look at and they get along better.

But, Mr. Speaker, even that argument, if we will consider the figures I will read in a moment, does not support them. There is another class who want this law—and I make no reflection upon them or any one of them—and that is the referees and other officers who enforce this law. I have no quarrel with them because they want it retained. They know what they want, but the fact of their personal interest is not persuasive to my mind that it is best for the country to keep this law alive.

I said a moment ago that this law contributed to business failures, and it does. More than one man in more than one community, being oppressed and falling behind, has been forced into bankruptcy because his friends who stood ready and willing to put up the money to save him could not do it by reason of this law that made it dangerous to him and to them to go to his assistance.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRANTLEY. I must decline to yield, for my time is limited. Under our state system, as known to all the Members of the House who have practiced law, a man's neighbors and his friends have been able to save him by putting up the money necessary to do so. But to-day, under this law, with all state laws wiped out, let a man's credit be questioned and his doom is sounded. Let him be honest with his friend and reveal his insolvent condition and the friend stands to lose protection for the money he advances to save. Let him transfer or assign property with which to secure his friend and this may be the act that makes him a bankrupt. I object to this law for the reason that it conduces to failures.

I have never heard but one argument in favor of its retention, and that is that it is good and useful as a national collection law in that it is a uniform law for all the States and wipes out the preference laws of all the States. I have before me the report of the Attorney-General for last year, and I have a table, Exhibit 8 of his report, that gives the figures and sets forth in detail the operations of this bankruptcy law. I find, for the fiscal year 1909 the total liabilities, direct and contingent, that were adjudicated throughout the United States in bankruptcy amounted in round numbers to $120,000,000. I find that the total dividends declared to creditors on these one hundred and twenty millions of liabilities was in round numbers $12,000,000, or 10 per cent, and I find that in order to declare this pitiful sum of 10 per cent there were expended in fees and commissions and expenses more than $3,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, the report for the fiscal year 1908 was a little better than this. In that year, out of practically the same amount of liabilities—$120,000,000—there were realized thirteen millions of dividends, while last year these dividends were cut down to twelve millions. In many States dividends of only 1 and 2 and 5 per cent have been realized, while the average for the entire country is but 10 per cent.

I am aware that in some States when we had no bankruptcy law there were enacted insolvency laws and preference laws, about which some people complained, and perhaps justly so, but I believe that there has never been in any State any insolvency law, no matter how much it may have been complained of, under which a greater dividend than 10 per cent was not declared to creditors.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRANTLEY. I must decline to yield, Mr. Speaker. I have not before me now the figures of the various States, but in my State creditors under our insolvency laws averaged more than 10 per cent of their claims. It seems to me that if this law, after twelve years of operation and in the twelfth year of its operation, with all of the perfections and amendments it has received, can not produce to creditors but 10 per cent of their claims, it should not be retained on the statute books, even as a collection law.

I have not the slightest interest in the bankruptcy laws of foreign countries, because those countries have not our dual system of government. The sovereign power and rights of our States as known to us are unknown to them. We can have good and efficient laws governing the collection of debts without a national law on the subject, and the States, being powerless to impair the obligations of contracts, their laws can never invite the dishonesty that the present bankruptcy law and all real bankruptcy laws do. I shall vote for the amendment repealing the law. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG of New York. Mr. Speaker, I think the proposition to repeal the bankruptcy law, which has just been made by gentlemen on the other side, is one of the most dangerous that has been suggested in any legislation presented to this body in a long time. I do not speak as a lawyer, and am not going to consider that phase of the question at all, but I speak simply as a business man, cognizant of the operation of the bankruptcy law, and of the absence of a bankruptcy law for nearly thirty years.

During 1908 there were 15,996 commercial and banking failures, the amount involved being $397,000,000, and any proposition to remove the only safeguard which has been suggested and in operation for years to safeguard the creditors is certainly beyond my comprehension. I have observed the working of the bankruptcy law carefully and have studied many cases. Fortunately for me, I have had occasion to participate in but few, but I suggest if the bankruptcy law were stricken from the statutes of this country we would be confronted with a commercial credit condition unparalleled. Bankruptcies would assuredly increase enormously. The bankruptcy law has been a restraint and has deterred many of those who would make dishonest failures, and is a safeguard to those who by misfortune in business are brought to insolvency. The law stands as a guardian and as a refuge for those who in times of business depression are hard pressed by clamorous creditors, and for all those who are brought into this dreadful condition through no fault of their own. They know, if their actions have been upright and their career has been honest, and if their statements made to creditors are true, they have nothing to fear, and they can with confidence turn their affairs over to a bankruptcy court to be adjudicated, and there is not one in a thousand of those who fail honestly but appreciates the value of the law.

Those who are dishonest and those who fail for the advantages that shall come to them tremble, for they know they are to be held to strict accountability for their actions and statements to procure credit in the past, as well as their actions at the time of their suspension.

During the last few years a great many merchants and manufacturers have entered commercial life, who, when their business is successful, pay 100 cents on the dollar, because it brings them continuous credit, and they can make more money by continuing than by failure. There are those that are willing to make money in any way that is possible. Men who are willing to make false statements in order to establish credit secure all the merchandise possible, in some instances knowing they are insolvent and will be unable to pay at maturity. Men who send their goods untouched to the auction rooms to be disposed of for cash, or to friends or relatives, who give preference to favored ones to defraud their creditors, for such as these the bankruptcy court makes impossible their continuance in business and prevents their preying on the business community, as the bankruptcy laws are primarily for the protection of creditors and to prevent fraudulent failures.

Mr. Speaker, I concede that the present law is not perfect and has lamentably failed in some particulars, but almost any bankruptcy law is better than no law, and the purpose of the amendment under consideration is to perfect it as far as possible. Many changes have taken place in the business of this country in the twelve years since the bankruptcy measure became law, and it is high time it should be amended. I am sure the changes in the pending bill improve it very much. The greatest trouble has been the cost of administration, which consumed a large percentage of the assets. This objection is entirely removed in the bill before us, which fixes a maximum amount which may be charged by a trustee, marshal, or receiver.

The statement made by the gentleman from Alabama that we need bankruptcy laws only in time of panic is absurd. We need such laws as will deter those who would fail dishonestly, and aid honest business men in distress. We need bankruptcy laws to prevent panics as far as possible. We want laws which will provide equitable treatment for creditors and debtors alike. We want laws which will set aside attachments made while honest creditors sleep or have not been advised of the failing condition of debtors. We want laws which will give the merchant or manufacturer that which belongs to him.

The gentlemen opposed to the amendment under consideration say that this is simply a debt-collection measure. Mr. Speaker, I hope it may prove not alone a debt collector, but a wholesome deterrent to dishonest debtors. I hope it will place on an equality creditors far away as well as those who are near the insolvent, so that no advantages may be taken by those whose proximity may give them an insight into conditions unobtainable by those creditors at a distance who have parted with their merchandise or money.

Under the bill under consideration the receiver can at any time, either before or after adjudication, consider a composition, which, I think, is an excellent provision.

Mr. Speaker, one of the most important features of this bill is that relating to false statements made in writing to creditors or to anyone for the purpose of establishing credit, obtaining money, or property, or credit. This defines the making of such false statements to mercantile agencies or individuals an offense punishable by imprisonment.

Mr. Speaker, I think the amendments provided in the bill under consideration are admirable, will prove advantageous and effective, and I sincerely hope it will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DIEKEMA].

Mr. DIEKEMA. Mr. Speaker, it will of course be impossible within the brief time allotted me to in any way fully analyze the different provisions contained in these amendments to the bankruptcy law, but I think I can summarize them by saying that they are of three different characters. In the first place, these amendments strive to bring within the funds to be administered by the receiver and the trustee all the funds of the bankrupt that legitimately belong there. Under the old law it was possible to keep outside of these funds certain funds of the bankrupt, and the object, the first great object, of these amendments is this: That everything which the bankrupt possesses above his exemptions shall come within this fund and shall be administered. So that his entire estate, all of his assets, must be given up to the trustee or receiver, as the case may be. The second great object of these amendments is this: That this fund when so brought within the purview of the court shall be economically administered. One of the grave difficulties with the present law is this: That in some jurisdictions of the country when the assets once go into the hands of the receiver they never go back to the creditors where they justly belong, the receiver considering it his duty to entirely absorb the assets of the bankrupt's estate. Now, the amendments provided for in this Sherley bill absolutely prevent such a condition.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIEKEMA. I will yield, but simply for a question.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I understood the gentleman to say that under the law as now administered the receivers considered it to be their duty to absorb the entire estate. Was that correct?

Mr. DIEKEMA. In some jurisdictions.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman point out some instances?

Mr. DIEKEMA. I could, Mr. Speaker, but I do not have the time now to go into detail, but I state that is the fact and it can be substantiated.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not deny it.

Mr. DIEKEMA. I am glad the gentleman admits it.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. And I know of cases where it happened.

Mr. DIEKEMA. Now, this bill provides against that iniquity, so that hereafter when these amendments are adopted there will be an estate left after it comes from the hands of the receiver because all he can receive for his compensation is a certain percentage upon the property received and distributed. In the third place the object of these amendments is to provide for uniformity in the construction of this statute in order that we may know in every judicial district of the country just how this statute will be interpreted. Now, a man may become a bankrupt in one district and certain rules will apply, and he may become a bankrupt in another district and certain other rules will apply, but this will make uniformity in the decisions of the court. In the next place it allows corporations to come in and become voluntary bankrupts. Under the old system they could not do this and it was simply whipping the devil about the bush. They could always secure somebody to file a petition and then admit their bankruptcy. By this bill we propose to let the corporation come just as an individual would in filing his petition.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. May I ask a question right there?

Mr. DIEKEMA. Just a question.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. It is not necessary for a corporation which gets its charter from the State to go into bankruptcy in order to wind up its affairs and distribute its assets. It can surrender its charter and give it up to the State and the State distributes the assets to the creditors, and it does not have to go into the bankruptcy court.

Mr. DIEKEMA. Under the provision we make, Mr. Speaker, it allows all of the assets of the corporation to come in and then the state laws step in, and if there is any individual liability on the part of the directors or the stockholders under the state laws this bill does not change the situation.

Mr. KEIFER. That is the present law.

Mr. DIEKEMA. Certainly, that is the present law, but the present law does not allow a corporation to become a voluntary bankrupt, while under the provisions of this bill a voluntary bankruptcy on the part of a corporation is permissible. Now, Mr. Speaker, under the old system before this bankrupt law was adopted there was a systematic series of frauds going on in the different States, the like of which I believe has never been known in this country. Men selected their aunts or cousins, their relatives of every name and nature, their banks, as preferred creditors. They gave them mortgages which were unrecorded, liens and evidences of indebtedness that the public knew nothing about, and then finally when the outside creditors endeavored to secure their rights all the assets of these debtors were distributed among their relatives, who had been made preferred creditors, and if they failed to-day the relatives sold out their property to-morrow, and the day after to-morrow they were back in business under an assumed name, with all of their assets intact, and with their legitimate creditors defrauded out of every cent due them.

Now, this system of favoritism is an invitation to fraud, a highway to corruption. We have wiped out, I say, by this bankruptcy law, this highway to corruption, this great opportunity for fraud and deceit, and under the present law a man, whether he be related to the bankrupt or not, stands an equal chance for a division of the property and assets of the bankrupt. To repeal it would be a step backward in morals as well as business. The amendments are all in the line of a better administration of what is already a good law and will produce more honesty, more integrity, more confidence in the business of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. TIRRELL. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] consume the rest of his time, inasmuch as we shall close with one speech on this side?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifty minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I think I will need about ten minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] ten minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I have on more than one occasion expressed my opposition to a permanent bankruptcy law. I am not in favor of it, and I have never been in favor of a permanent bankruptcy law. I would to-day, as I have endeavored on some other occasions, vote to repeal it in its entirety. I do not believe that there should be upon the statute books of any country, of this National Government, or of the States a permanent law which invites a man to conceive and know when he make a contract that there is some other way of meeting the obligations than complying with the contract as he undertook it.

I believe in the wisdom of the legislature at times which provides for temporary relief for honest debtors. I believe in the wisdom of the Constitution makers when they provided that Congress should have power to enact uniform bankruptcy laws, and, following that authority, the wisdom of the legislatures of our country has shown that it is following great periods of financial distress that the power of Congress has been sought to be exercised.

Following the Revolutionary war, after seven years of hardship, suffering, and devastation had passed, and our people were all in debt, the act of 1800 provided for a national bankruptcy law in the nature of an involuntary bankruptcy law, the people being permitted only to enforce involuntary proceedings in case of fraud. And the very act itself shows that the Members of Congress did not have any conception that it should be permanent, because it was written in the first bankruptcy law that we ever had that it should expire by its own force in two years. From 1800 to 1841 we never thought of having a bankruptcy law upon our statute books. And following back of 1840 what was known as the bankruptcy law, I wish that I had time to call attention to some of the debates made at that time, especially a debate by Mr. Webster and Mr. Clay, those great constitutional lawyers and great statesmen, who had a large conception of the theory and genesis and formation of our country. They believed that the theory of legislation should be that we should only have a voluntary bankruptcy law, so that the citizen who had been without any fault on his part encumbered with gerat debt might surrender his property and be released from debt, as the States could not pass any law that would violate the obligations of a contract. That very act so aroused the indignation of the honest people of the country that it was repealed by the very Congress that enacted it in 1842. Such was the condition to 1867, when, following the war between the States, the people became indebted and ruined, and devastation was everywhere.

I will put in the RECORD at this point the speech delivered by that great lawyer from Ohio in 1873, Senator Thurman, on the subject of bankruptcy:

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, a vote in favor of the motion of the Senator from Iowa to send the bill to the Judiciary Committee with instructions to amend the law as is contemplated in that motion is a vote not to repeal the bankrupt law. It would be an instruction of the Senate to the Judiciary Committee to attempt what that committee attempted four years ago—that is, to so amend the bankrupt law as to preserve it—and consequently the motion is directly adverse to the bill which is now under consideration. The bill proposes to repeal the law; the instruction of the Senator from Iowa proposes to preserve it with amendments. I can not vote for the instruction. I can not do so because I believe that the people of Ohio are almost unanimously in favor of a repeal of the law.

I can not do so for another reason. Four years ago, nearly five, we were flooded with petitions to repeal the bankrupt law. Those petitions did not come from the class of persons that it is supposed are adverse to a repeal to-day. The Senator from Massachusetts on my right and nearest to me [Mr. DAWES] spoke of the bankrupt law as if it were particularly in the interest of the debtor and its preservation necessary for him. Now, sir, in December, 1873, when the House passed a bill to repeal the law, when we were flooded with petitions for its repeal, almost all of them came from the debtors. The creditors did not ask for the repeal. The debtors asked for it; and why did they ask for it? "Because," they said, "this bankrupt law makes it impossible for us to make arrangements by which we can carry on our business; we can not borrow money and give security that this bankrupt law may not set aside; we can not sell property to raise money to carry on business, because the sale may be vacated within four months under the operation of this bankrupt law; we can not make any composition with our creditors who would be disposed to make compositions with us and to aid us in our business and enable us to go on, because of this bankrupt law that sets all of them aside; and, therefore, although nine-tenths of our creditors may be in favor of such composition or such an arrangement with them as will enable us to continue our business and get out of our difficulties, there may be a tenth creditor who insists on levying blackmail on us in order that his assent may be obtained." And thus, sir, it was that the petitions that came here were generally from the debtors, who said, "This law stands in the way of our making such arrangements with our creditors as will enable us to continue our business."

And I say now that in respect to a large number of debtors, men who do not want to go into bankruptcy, men who do not want to become voluntary bankrupts, but who want to make such arrangements as will enable them to carry on their business—in respect of all that class of men, their cry is still the same; they do not want the law to stand, because it interferes with those arrangements which would be necessary to carry on their business. The cry, then, for the repeal of the bankruptcy law heretofore, since 1873, has been more on behalf of the debtors than on behalf of the creditors. I do not deny that there is a large number of debtors who want the law to remain, many of them very meritorious men and some of them not so meritorious; and I do not deny that their wishes ought to be taken into consideration, that their necessities ought to be taken into consideration; nor have I any doubt whatever that if we repeal this law, whenever the country becomes deeply indebted again, whenever such a crisis takes place as took place in 1873, or before that in 1837, there will be just as much or more clamor for a bankrupt law as there is now for its repeal.

For, Mr. President, ever since the discovery made in 1841, that it was competent for Congress to pass what is called a voluntary bankrupt law—a thing never heard of before in any country that I am aware of—that it was competent for Congress to pass a bankrupt law and allow not only traders but everybody, of his own mere motion, on the surrender of his effects, to be relieved from the payment of his debts—ever since that I have never had any doubt that whenever the country became deeply indebted, or when a larger body of the people of the country became deeply indebted, their appeals to Congress would produce the enactment of a bankrupt law of that character; and I have come to the conclusion that the legislation of this country in the future on this subject will somewhat bring us to the idea of the Hebrew jubilee, the fiftieth year, when the debtors went free. We will not wait fifty years for that; only about fifteen or twenty years. Repeal this law now, and there are men in this Senate young enough to see another bankrupt law enacted and the debtors go free—that is, to have another year of jubilee—and when it shall have achieved its task, it will be repealed, and some fifteen or twenty years after that another year of jubilee will be ordained. But so far as the present feelings of the country are concerned, so far as the present opinion of the American people is concerned, it does seem to me, and I do not think I can be mistaken about it—I think the vote in this Senate and the vote in the House of Representatives show it—the present opinion of the country is adverse to the continuance of this law upon the statute book.

Mr. President, I said that in 1873 we had many appeals to us to repeal this law, and a bill actually passed the House for that purpose, and another one passed the House since that, and each time by large majorities. Now, I think it is pretty safe to say that the House of Representatives, so close to the people, understands the wishes of the people pretty well, and would not from time to time send us bills passed by immense majorities to repeal this law if that was not the sentiment of the country. I think it is also pretty certain that the Senate would not have voted as it did to repeal the law if Senators had not convinced themselves of the opinion of the country in respect to it.

Now let me say to those who think it such an easy thing for the Judiciary Committee to frame a bankrupt law which will satisfy everybody, that if they will try to perform that task themselves, they will find they never entered upon a more difficult undertaking. I can say for myself, I can say for the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I can say for another member of that committee, who was on the subcommittee which considered the subject then, and who reported it to the whole committee, and who bestowed two months of as diligent work as men ever performed in trying to so amend the bankrupt law as to preserve it and make it more beneficial and less harmful, I can say that no men ever did work harder than they did; and if the law which now is on the statute book, and which is the bill as they amended it and reported it to the Senate, and which passed without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," I believe, through this body and the House of Representatives, is as imperfect and bad as it has been described to be, I, for one, wish to say that I am wholly incompetent to perform that task which the Senator from Iowa proposes to impose upon us.

I shall never undertake again to amend this law and make it satisfactory either to the Senate or the House or the people. I would rather try to make a new one. Why, sir, take one provision in the amendment that we reported, one great amendment that we reported, that of provided for a composition with the creditors, and which we borrowed from a recent British statute and which came ably commended to us. This very day, on this floor, a Senator told me that that was what made the law so obnoxious; that that was utterly indefensible, and yet I could show him in the committee room letter after letter from lawyer after lawyer and judge after judge to the effect that that is the very best feature in the law. So the profession differ, some of them thinking, as the Senator who spoke to me thinks, that that provision was just as bad as it could be, and that it ought to be stricken out of the law; others that that is the very best provision in the law.

But, sir, that is only one out of many things. The great objection to this law that is usually urged is that nothing comes out of it to the creditor; he gets absolutely nothing; it is all eaten up in costs and expenses and he gets nothing. That is the great objection that is usually made to the law.

There is an objection that is not publicly uttered. It may exist in the mind; it is no doubt in the minds of many of the creditor class who are endeavoring to exact the last penny; and that is the voluntary feature of the law. These men do not want a voluntary bankrupt law at all; they want a real bankrupt law such as was known to this country before the act of 1841, when we had no bankrupt law but such as was known in England and on the Continent of Europe. That is what they want, a law wholly in the interest of the creditor; but our bankrupt laws now and since the act of 1841 are almost wholly in the interest of the debtor, as is supposed by many.

Why, Mr. President, it would have very much surprised an Englishman or a subject of one of the continental powers of Europe, unacquainted with our laws, to have heard what has been said on this floor to-day in respect to a bankrupt law—to hear a bankrupt law spoken of as one of the beatitudes of the debtors of the country. Why, there is no such thing as a voluntary bankrupt law except in the United States, so far as I know or ever heard. All the bankrupt laws in Europe, so far as I know or have heard, are laws for the creditor to compel the debtor into a bankrupt court, and not for the debtor to go voluntarily into bankruptcy and obtain a discharge from his obligations. So severe are those laws that the old maxim in Italy, where bankrupt laws originated, when Venice and Genoa were the great commercial cities of the world, was that every failure of a merchant to pay his debts was to be esteemed fraudulent until the contrary was proved.

The bankruptcy law as enforced in England and as it had its origin in Venice and Genoa never had any idea of being enacted for the benefit of the debtor. We hear much about the poor debtor. This bankruptcy law now upon the statute books, these amendments sought to be put upon the statute books, are not in the interest of the debtor. The purpose of our bankruptcy laws, until we passed this one, has been to relieve honest debtors of their debt by giving up their property and surrendering it.

The operation of the act of 1867 in the section of the country where I live was fraught with fraud, expense, and extravagance, and did destruction to the rights of contract and the debts of the people, until it rose to be a very stench in the nostrils of the whole people of the country, and it was repealed. Not until after the panic of 1893—a Republican panic, brought on in 1891 and in 1892 by the acts of the Republican party in destroying the surplus in the Treasury and wasteful expenditures of the surplus left there by President Cleveland—following that panic, in 1898, we enacted this law.

I will call attention to the results in the remarks I will print. The bill that came to the House from the Senate and that the Senate passed provided only for the voluntary feature of a bankruptcy bill and an involuntary feature in reference to cases originating in fraud.

This bill that we have here was passed more in aid of collecting debts, and not in aid of the poor debtor, as some of you will be told and as some have been told.

Now, the creditors down where I live—the merchants in my town, the wholesale merchants, the retail merchants, the big merchants and the little merchants—all appeal to me to vote for the repeal, because ordinarily when they go into the bankruptcy court, why, they are glad to get out with anything. I am not criticising anybody. I am going to read some figures and let them criticise the enforcement of this law in the State where I live.

Take the State of Georgia, in the northern district. I live in the southern district. I will read, then, the northern district:

Total liabilities in the northern district, $471,000 of voluntary bankruptcy; total assets realized, $144,450; total dividends, $24,431.50; total fees, commissions, and expenses, $16,360.77, requiring nearly 30 cents on the dollar of court expenses to collect that.

That is voluntary.

Involuntary, northern district, $142,715.71; total assetss and resources, on tof $142,715.71, $43,751.17; total dividends, $38,887; expenses out of $38,000, $6,317.

Think of it! To collect for the creditor, to get $38,000 in the court, without counting what he has to pay for his own lawyer or to others, $6,318.48.

Now I go to the southern district:

Voluntary, total liabilities, $471,000; realized, $144,452; dividends, $24,431——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not want to consume any time the gentleman needs. (Continuing:)

Total fees and commissions, $16,350.77; involuntary, $548,662; amount realized, $97,000; total dividends, $35,000; expenses, $13,000.

I ask permission to put in the statement of like character from the State of Kentucky. It happens to be the State of my friend, who is advocating the retention of this law, and proposing certain very fruitful amendments if this bill is to remain upon the statute books.

Mr. Speaker, I believe in keeping contracts. The State of Georgia can enact insolvency laws, and the Supreme Court of the United States decided away back in Fourth Wheaton, in the case of Sturgiss against Crowninshield, as far as her own citizens are concerned and as far as contracts in the future are concerned, the State can enact a law to relieve them from liability. I have the case here, if the gentleman would like to see it.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is right.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. My State and its people are honest. They do not need to be dragged into the federal court in order to pay their debts. The merchants and people that built up that section until it has blossomed like the rose, until it is to-day attracting the amazement and wonder of the world, are unanimous almost in denouncing that law, which is a law not for the keeping of contracts or for the collection of debts, but for the violation of contracts and for defrauding honest merchants of their dues. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the consideration of the measure here proposed involves no constitutional question. We all understand that the organic law expressly authorizes Congress to pass a bankruptcy act. The matter now before us is the retention of the bankruptcy act and its further amendment, or its abrogation. The question is not one of authority, but is one of policy.

It can not be denied that the framers of the Constitution never intended to say that we should have a permanent bankruptcy system, but wisely left the character of such legislation to the discretion of the Congress, with the limitation, the only limitation, that any bankruptcy law shall be uniform—that is to say, uniform in the geographical sense.

In pursuance of constitutional authority the legislative policy has been to enact a bankruptcy law to relieve the people of onerous debts created or existing in time of great financial depression, and this policy has been invariably further extended to the repeal of such bankruptcy act after the return of normal business conditions. Therefore we may say, as being indisputable, that a bankruptcy system was never contemplated as a permanent system of the Government; in other words, bankruptcy law has always been intended to relieve unfortunate debtors in the time of dire distress, and the rule of the Congress has been to repeal such a legislation when the distress passed away. In the very nature of things this is the correct view and practice; for the only reason in law or excuse in morals for a bankruptcy act is the relief of unfortunate debtors in time of general or wide-spread calamity. This is the prime object of such legislation, and no bankruptcy act can be justified upon the ground that it gives a creditor, through the process of involuntary bankruptcy, a remedy for the collection of his debts.

When business conditions are normal there can be no justification of the retention of voluntary bankruptcy laws, for then few, if any, honest men need to invoke its excusatory aid, and certainly no one can contend that dishonest men should have a voluntary bankruptcy law, to exempt them from their just liabilities. And further, it may be said, if there be no reason for retaining a law in the interests of unfortunate and oppressed debtors—and this must be the very foundation of every bankruptcy law—surely an involuntary bankruptcy law ought not to be kept in force primarily or really as collection machinery for creditors.

The country has moved away from the panic which brought about the enactment of the present bankruptcy law, and this, therefore, is the opportune time for its entire repeal. Surely the friends of the present administration, you gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, will not contend that we are now in the midst of a panic. Will you assert by speech or by your votes here to-day that the country is now threatened with a panic, and that there is great danger of impending and overwhelming financial distress to the people?

This is a time of profound peace; there is no foreign war, and no great domestic trouble, except the high cost of living, brought about largely by the enactment of unwise legislation and the failure to execute laws aimed at the prevention of the wrongful and unlawful trade practices and combinations. Let me ask what sound morality, what sound legislative policy, what business necessity is there, that commits you to the retention of the bankruptcy law? Why is this statute, which has stood much longer than any one of the like kind, more sacred than all bankruptcy acts heretofore passed by Congress? These questions address themselves to the individual judgment of each man here present. Are we wiser or better than those who have gone before us? Is the existing act more deeply rooted in morality than those which have gone before it? Is the present time one more distressful than the times in which the former acts were repealed? Is the country suffering on account of widespread financial distress? Is it to be admitted that impending business disaster so threatens the country that the bankruptcy law must be retained to meet the exigencies of such a calamity? Is such disaster so impending and threatening that you dare not repeal the bankruptcy law? Let us hope not. Rather let us say that the time is ripe for its repeal.

Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes several amendments to the bankruptcy act of 1898. It is an indictment against that law, and it must be remembered that at every session of Congress like measures, seeking to amend the law, are brought here for consideration. The injustices of the act and the abuses of it are so numerous and so grave that these very injustices and abuses demand the abolition of the law. For twelve years the best legal talent and the ripest business experience have not been able to correct these injustices or prevent these abuses. On the contrary, it seems that the evils growing up out of this bankruptcy system continue to multiply. Session after session of Congress has given patient attention to learned men in Congress and out of Congress in the effort to perfect this legislation, and yet, after a life of twelve years, when this legislative infant has taken off its swaddling clothes, can stand alone, and is, in fact, wearing trousers, the gentlemen who advocate its retention admit that this bad infant—now a lusty youth—grows worse as the years increase. They invoke temporizing corrective methods. Mr. Speaker, doubtless a better plan would be, instead of correcting this incorrigible that is doing so much harm, harm which the friends of the bankruptcy law admit; harm which the referees in bankruptcy admit; harm which the receivers at bankruptcy courts admit; harm which the judges who administer the law admit; I think, sir, that instead of attempting to correct the incorrigible, it would be wiser to pursue the Spartan method of destroying this worse than cripple, this hunchback, this legislative monstrosity which has served its purpose, and remove it altogether from the statute books, and let all the people conform their business transactions—buyers and sellers, debtors and creditors—to honest laws and honest methods of administration in the courts.

Again, Mr. Speaker, let me remind the House that the Congress is often called upon to increase the number of federal judges. No one act of Congress has contributed more to the necessity for the increase of the number of federal judges than the bankruptcy act has. This law has piled up unnecessary business in the federal courts, and the interests of the people at large have not been subserved, and debtors and creditors are now receiving no deserved or substantial benefit from its retention. Unjustifiable public expense comes from its retention. Indefensible wrongs are committed by dishonest men under its license, and it is used, or rather abused, more and more as an instrument of oppression on the part of the creditor class.

This brings me, Mr. Speaker, to reply to some of the assertions made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DIEKEMA], who inveighs against the States. He said that prior to the bankruptcy law systematic frauds were being perpetrated under state law. He pictured to your minds a perfect saturnalia of crime and fraud in the various States of this Union, and as being sanctioned by the people of the sovereign States.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the morality of any State of this Union, that the morality of any legislature of any State in the Union, that the local authorities of any State in the Union average as high as the morals and ideals of the Members of this House of Representatives. No stream can rise higher than its source. We are merely the representatives of the people—the people of the several States—and can not be any better than our people whose exponents we are, or whose exponents we ought to be, if we live up to the just expectations of our constituencies. I deny, sir, that under the laws of Alabama, without any bankruptcy act of Congress to prevent their full operation, there was as much fraud committed as there is under the bankruptcy law. I believe, sir, in the right of local self-government. I believe that the fathers were right when they recognized in the organic law of the Union the reserved powers of the State. I believe that the State which exercises by far the larger number of functions of government, so far as the people in their daily affairs and conduct are concerned, is a wiser instrumentality of government than a centralized despotism at Washington. Against the gentleman's fervent eulogy in behalf of the assumption of power or the exercise of more power by the Federal Government I oppose the rightful and reserved powers of the States and the capacity and the honesty of the people in the States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to address myself more particularly to the provisions of the pending bill. The friends of the measure say that it is necessary to amend the bankruptcy law because in its administration the courts in construing it have made conflicting decisions, and that there are faults in its administrative features. In other words, that the law, notwithstanding repeated amendments, is still uncertain in its meaning in essential particulars, and is the subject of other great abuses in its administration. Let me predict here and now that conflict in the decisions of the courts in construing the bankruptcy law will continue to multiply, even after the passage of this bill, should it pass. Let me also say that abuses and wrongs will multiply in the bankruptcy law as long as it exists.

Sections 1 and 9 of this bill refer to the compensation of receivers, marshals, and trustees, and seek to limit the compensation of these officials when they render more than ordinary services in the management of a bankrupt estate. My objection to this provision of the bill is that it still leaves the matter of fixing the compensation of these officials too largely to the discretion of the court, and also that the compensation which can be allowed under this amendment to these court officials is too great and in excess of fees allowed in the state court for like services rendered by officials there.

The second section of the bill is for the purpose of making the doctrine of ancillary jurisdiction of bankruptcy proceedings, as laid down in Lathrop v. Drake (91 U. S., 516)—the law which, by the way, was a decision made under the bankruptcy act of 1867—control in all cases, rather than have the doctrine laid down In re Williams (123 Fed., 321) and In re Sutter Brothers (131 Fed., 654) and other cases prevail. It may be necessary to confer ancillary jurisdiction on all district courts, and it may be that this jurisdiction is necessary for proper administration of the law for the recovering and protection of assets outside of the districts where the proceedings are pending; and it may be wise, because "of enabling the administration thereof to be conducted near home." I may be permitted to suggest that this seems to me to partake of the nature of an argument in favor of the state courts, which are at least capable of honestly and justly administering home affairs.

Section 3 of the bill provides for the voluntary bankruptcy of corporations. The excuse for this amendment is that under the bankruptcy act as it now stands a corporation can admit in writing its inability to pay its debts and its willingness to be adjudged a bankrupt on that ground. And, say the committee that reported this bill:

> Of course this act of bankruptcy furnishes merely a roundabout way for a corporation voluntarily to go into bankruptcy.

And further, the committee say:

> There is no reason why a corporation should not be entitled to directly go into bankruptcy as a voluntary bankrupt for the benefit of its creditors without this subterfuge and without the long and expensive preliminaries of an involuntary petition, the appointing of a receiver—

And so forth.

However sound may be this contention, still I must be permitted to observe the sage remark of the committee that corporations indulge in subterfuge not to say fraud under the bankruptcy law, and the majority of the committee seem to be of the opinion that the court should be opened wide to corporations to free themselves of debts. In other words, that corporations are entitled to the same humane provision of law to relieve them of liabilities that have heretofore been accorded to the poor individual citizen laboring under the load of oppressive debts. Corporations are formed by individuals to escape or limit individual liability. Why further enlarge the opportunity to avoid the payment of just debts by extending further provisions in that direction to corporations?

The majority of the committee say that section 4 of the bill strikes out these words from the original act:

> And any corporation engaged in manufacturing, printing, publishing, mining, or mercantile pursuits.

And substitutes for them these words:

> Any moneyed, business, or commercial corporation, except a municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporation.

And then the majority of the committee proceed to give the reasons for making this change, and in the report review a number of cases, drawing some very "amazing distinctions," to quote the report, and the report might have added other very "amusing" as well as "amazing" distinctions. I submit this as another argument for the repeal of the bankruptcy law, certainly not an argument for its retention.

Section 5 doubtless improves the bankruptcy law, for that seeks to confer some benefit upon the unfortunate debtor, in that it will permit him to make a composition with his creditors before he is adjudged a bankrupt. This is at least one humane provision in the bill now pending.

Section 6 of the bill contains, in my judgment, a far-reaching and dangerous innovation. This amendment proposes to add to section 14, subdivision b, of the bankruptcy act the new subdivision 3, in these words: "or (3) obtain money or property on credit upon a materially false statement in writing made by him to any person for the purpose of obtaining credit or of being communicated to the trade or to the person from whom he obtained such property on credit," and so forth. This amendment is very liberal toward creditors and very harsh and drastic toward debtors and seems to be primarily in the interests of the commercial agencies of the country. It is true that if such a large office or character is bestowed upon a statement in writing the business of commercial agencies will be benefited by this legislative indorsement of their methods, and by this additional force given to the reports or statements which they gather from time to time. But it will not be said that giving an impetus or encouragement to the private business of commercial agencies can be of real public benefit.

Section 7 makes it clear that the state courts, as well as the federal courts, may entertain suits to set aside certain fraudulent transfers of property. In that this seeks to bring the administration of the law nearer home it is an improvement on the act as it now stands. But why not further improve the law by repealing the bankruptcy act and leaving the state courts to set aside fraudulent conveyances?

On account of the decision in York Manufacturing Company v. Cassell (201 U. S., 344), section 8 of the bill is proposed. In that case it was held that property conveyed by an unrecorded instrument, and which would have been void in the state courts had the property been taken by the assignee or receiver of a state court, or levied upon by attachment or execution from a state court, was not void where the possession was taken by a receiver or a trustee in bankruptcy of the federal court—the court holding that the trustee stood in the place of the bankrupt in regard to the unrecorded instrument, and that, although in the state court had the seizure been made by the assignee or receiver of the state court, or by the sheriff under execution or attachment, the unrecorded instrument would have been void as against creditors. In other words, it was held in this case that the trustee in bankruptcy had no more right or title than the bankrupt himself had. This amendment seems to be an improvement upon the federal statute, because it makes the federal statute conform to the state laws of, I believe, all or nearly all of the States of the Union. I may be permitted to observe, Mr. Speaker, that even in this day Congress can learn many valuable lessons from the laws of the States and from the administration of public justice in the States and under state authority.

The subject covered by section 9 of the bill I have referred to in the outset of my review of the measure.

Section 10 merely relates to the matter of practice in giving notice for the discharge of a bankrupt.

Section 11 of the bill follows the legislation of most of the States of the Union and seeks to do away with secret liens. It may be that a business man may find himself sorely in need of ready cash. Although he may be abundantly solvent, yet, with this amendment as the law, he can not obtain the ready cash from a confidential friend and give that friend a valid lien unless the lien be then recorded, and this recordation would probably ruin the credit of the business man. This amendment may be supported by sound commercial morality, but it may work hardship to honest men who need ready cash to tide them over temporary difficulty. It is true that the bankruptcy act recognizes preferences made four months before taking advantage of the law by prescribing a four months' statute of limitations as against state laws that may prescribe a longer period. This amendment is in derogation of any state law on the subject.

Again, I may be permitted to say that the repeal of the bankruptcy law would be better than the amendment proposed in section 12. The justification of this amendment is in the language of the majority of the committee, as follows:

> The change here merely inserts the words "to the extent of such present consideration only" after the word "shall" in the last clause of subdivision d of section 67 of the law. This change is made necessary by decisions of which Coder v. Arts (125 Fed., 943) and First National Bank v. Holt (155 Fed., 100) are typical, these decisions being nothing less than that if a debtor owes his creditor, say, $1,000, and the creditor, having no security, makes a subsequent loan of $10 to the same debtor and takes security covering both such subsequent and preceding loans, that his security is good as to both loans, even within the four months' period, or, perchance, the day before the bankruptcy. These decisions are now being made use of by creditors to secure unjust and inequitable advantages over other creditors, and are subversive of the plain purpose of the law that all creditors of the same class shall be treated alike. It is thought that the change suggested will meet the decisions and prevent these inequitable results.

Section 13 of the bill merely provides for the time when the proposed amendment shall take effect.

The minority of the committee have presented the suggestion embodied in the motion which I made, in behalf of the seven minority members of the committee, to amend the bill by adding thereto section 14, having as its object the entire repeal of the bankruptcy act, effective two years hence.

The views of the minority are as follows:

> We, the undersigned members of the Committee on the Judiciary, favor the repeal of the bankruptcy law rather than further amendment of it. It must be admitted, however, that if the law is to be retained it ought to be amended in some particulars, if not in all the particulars provided for in this bill (H. R. 20575). Some of us do not agree to all the amendments proposed in this bill and we do not commit ourselves at this time to any specific provision of the measure.
> We shall offer an amendment to the bill in the following words: On page 10, after the words "and six," in line 8, add the following new section:
> "SEC. 14. That the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved July 1, 1898, and all acts amendatory thereof, including the act approved February 15, 1903, and the act approved June 15, 1906, and this act, are hereby repealed, but this repeal shall not be operative until the expiration of two years from the date of the approval of this act: Provided, That the repeal of said act and amendatory acts shall not affect proceedings in bankruptcy pending at the time when this repealing clause or act becomes operative."

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] demonstrated that the bankruptcy law now does no good to anybody except those who take advantage of its provisions to avoid the payment of honest debts. He showed that the creditors get only about 10 per cent of the money collected under the law. Court officials and favorites get all the balance. This leads me to inquire, Whom do we find as the chief advocates besieging Congress for the retention of the bankruptcy law?

Mr. GILL of Missouri. Let me hand you a telegram which I have just received.

Mr. CLAYTON. I thank you. The telegram is in the following language:

ST. LOUIS, MO., February 23, 1910.

Hon. PATRICK GILL, M. C., Washington, D. C.:

We urge complete repeal of bankruptcy act. It has outlived its usefulness.

FERGUSON MCKINNEY DRY GOODS CO.

The gentleman informs me that this company does a very large wholesale business and that more than 200 traveling salesmen are in its employ.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I would state to the gentleman that every wholesale house and merchant in my district has written me letters asking that it be repealed.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am very glad that the gentleman made that statement. I knew it to be a fact, because I know that the people of Georgia are always sensible. My good father was born in Georgia, and I have always been proud of that State.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that all of the commercial bodies and the largest business concerns, both retail and wholesale, in Colorado have wired me to oppose the repeal of this act.

Mr. CLAYTON. That happened, I suppose, as a result of the two or three days of the hearing before the committee and the activity of lobbyists in behalf of this bill.

Now, returning to the idea suggested a while ago, let me ask who are the chief advocates besieging Congress for the retention of the bankruptcy law?

As a matter of fact, a few men, calling themselves "credit men," of a few wholesale houses in this country, have cooperated with the referees and receivers in bankruptcy and the court favorites and have carried on a lobby here and systematic work throughout the country for the retention of this law on the books. They have conducted a campaign from year to year since the enactment of this bankruptcy law. One gentleman who signed the minority views has been well nigh deluged with telegrams from a certain portion of his constituency to vote for this amendment and to oppose the repeal of the bankruptcy law. If the people—that is, the honest little merchant in your small town and in your great city, who has been "beaten" frequently out of his money by people taking advantage of this law—if those who are not benefited by the law, in short, who are robbed by this law, were banded together like the beneficiaries of its provisions, this statute would not stand upon the books thirty days. It would have been repealed long since. But it is like most measures. Where the interests of the people are concerned in legislation by Congress sometimes the people, the general public, have no one to voice their sentiments and wishes except Representatives brave and independent enough to know and assert what the people want and what is to their best interests. But whenever a special interest is sheltered behind special legislation, then immediately, by some sort of cooperation, there is formed some sort of a trust, some sort of an association for the benefit of those who are sheltered by the special law and for the perpetuation of that special interest, for that privilege under the law. Therefore no man can wonder that in this city, in the very shadow of this Capitol, within its very walls, within the last few days the special beneficiaries of a bankruptcy law have been here and have been busy for its retention. They have flooded people away from Washington with communications, beseeching them to send the Members of Congress telegrams for the retention of this law. Who is it that has done this? The referees in bankruptcy and the receivers in bankruptcy, the court favorites, men who are fed by virtue of the bankruptcy law, and some of them may have never made an honest dollar except as legislative and court favorites.

Now, if I could refer to what happened in the Committee on the Judiciary, but I can not, I might tell you that somewhere, somehow, at some time, one lone man calling himself a merchant may have appeared in advocacy of the retention of this law. And I might tell you that at some time in the realm of space, somewhere, referees in bankruptcy and receivers, court favorites, those who stand with outstretched arms and open palms asking the courts to hand them out fees and fees and fees—somewhere in the boundless realms of ethereal space these court favorites may have by possibility come with honeyed phrase, one-sided arguments, printed documents, ingratiating manners, and with ingenious counsel, able lawyers, and sought to persuade and to overawe by the use of the trick and flood of telegrams the Representatives of the people who favored the repeal of this act. Such methods are not persuasive of any inherent merit in the retention of this law.

Mr. Speaker, I can not refrain from calling attention to the fact there is all over this country complaint against the bankruptcy law by the retail merchants, because some dishonest people make it a practice to go into debt to these merchants for the necessaries of life and then seek the bankruptcy courts to get relief from the payment of such debts. There is pending before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives a bill proposing to prevent this practice. The majority of that committee, who have brought the pending bill into the House, have not, it seems, deemed the retail merchant worthy of consideration. It seems that their only care is for the wishes of some of the wholesale merchants in the great cities and the court officials who want to retain the law which so abundantly affords them fees.

Mr. Speaker, this bill, in fact every amendment enacted or proposed of the bankruptcy act, is an indictment against that law.

Its dishonesty, abuses under it, and injustices done by it are in evidence on every hand. More frauds and corruption have grown up out of the administration of the bankruptcy act than have come from all the laws of preference in all the States of the Union. We ought to go back to the old-fashioned primitive doctrine that requires the payment of all honest debts. If any forgiveness is sought the creditors will be ready to make a composition with the honest debtor even without the permission of any bankruptcy act. Let us cease to legislate in the interests of court officials and commercial agencies; in the interests of those who pretend to believe in the beneficence of the bankruptcy law, but at the same time want that law so harsh that but little would remain in it of good to the unfortunate debtor, and it would be rendered so drastic in its provisions that hasty and insatiate creditors could use the law as an engine to oppress the unfortunate.

Let us go back to honest and fundamental principles and repeal this law. If some political party in control of the Government shall be misguided or unfaithful in the discharge of public duty, and the country shall be precipitated into a panic and into great financial stringency, or if general distress shall come from other cause, the Congress can pass another bankruptcy act to relieve those who are irretrievably oppressed by debts. Do not let us further impeach the honesty and ability of the States to administer the laws and to subject, and if need be, distribute the estates of debtors as justice demands. Do not further impugn the right and the ability of the States to deal with the relation of debtor and creditor. This bankruptcy law has served its purpose. It should not be perverted into a collection agency or a permanent fee-getting system for the benefit of the court hangers-on. In the language of the street, it is "up to you," gentlemen of the House, whether the law shall be retained or abolished. I indulge the hope that the bankruptcy law will soon be repealed. I thank you for your courteous attention. [Applause.]

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirty-two minutes remaining.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield that time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if it were possible to put in parallel columns the arguments made by the various gentlemen who favor the repeal of the bankruptcy law, it would not be necessary for me to now reply to them, because they serve to answer each other. One gentleman complains of the bankruptcy law because it gives nothing to the creditors, and another gentleman complains of the law because it is only in the interest of the creditors, and they alone are lobbying for its retention. A curious fact it is that if the law absolutely dissipates the estate and is of no value to the creditor, the ceditor should be asking for its retention.

One man says, "I am opposed to any law that interferes with the payment of a debt," and then proceeds to state that he is in favor of a bankruptcy law occasionally—in times of panic. So that his real argument is this: "I do not want a bankruptcy law, because it interferes with the payment of a debt; but when we have a panic, then I do want it. Whenever the law is going to interfere with the payment of a lot of debts, then I want it; when it is going to interfere with the payment of a few debts, then I do not want it. [Applause.]

The distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY], a man who has proved his worth in this House, made a speech that I regret I can not agree to in any particular. He challenged a reason for the existence of a bankruptcy law, and then, as I have just stated, immediately said that sometimes he was in favor of such a law. Mr. Speaker, I am not in favor of intermittent justice. The laws of nature—the laws of God—are equitable because they are eternal, and the law that makes the right of a man dependent upon the chance of his embarrassment, his need of it occurring during the limited period of its operation, is not, to my mind, a good law. If it is proper that one man should at one time be relieved of his debt, it is equally proper that another man similarly situated at some other time should be relieved of his debt, and that can only be brought about by having a permanent law upon the statute books.

But I am not going to defend this law simply on the ground that it gives the poor debtor another chance in life. I defend it on the broader ground that equality is equity, and against the old common-law rule that to the diligent and speedy creditor shall be given the lion's share of a failing debtor's estate. [Applause.]

Against the imperfections of this law I point to the imperfections of the insolvency laws of forty-odd States. When you have pointed out to you the hardships of this law, remember the times of the midnight attachments, remember the preferences to the brother, to the wife, to the father-in-law, to the mother-in-law, whereby the distant creditor was prevented from getting his just debt. Oh, but this is a collection law, we are told. It is, but it is not simply a collection law; and since when, gentlemen, did it get to be a crime to create a law for the collection of debt? Why, the very purpose of government is to see that that which is owing to a man shall be given to him, and what we provide by a bankruptcy law is that all men shall have an equal chance in obtaining what is due him out of a failing debtor's estate. What you had under the old system was that the man near at hand or the man in the special favor of the debtor got the lion's share.

Now, a challenge has been made of a single good that the law has done. I say to you that it has done more to increase the credit of the poorer sections of this country than any law that was ever put upon the statute books. And why do I make that sweeping statement? Because it gives assurance to the foreign creditor, if he lends to a merchant and misfortune overtakes that merchant, that he will have an equal chance with the home creditor. To the South particularly this law is of value; to the States that have had to go to the North and to the East for aid in financing their undertakings it is of value. You let the uncertainty of the collection of a debt exist, and you either prevent the obtaining of credit or you obtain that credit at a higher rate of interest. The fact that the distant merchant knows that he is on an equal footing with every other creditor as to their debtor warrants him in extending credit that he never would extend otherwise, and did not extend prior to this law.

But that is not all. What happened in the old days when a man was in trouble? Did he dare let his creditor know that he was temporarily embarrassed? No. He had to hide from him and from all others the condition of his affairs. Why? Not because a particular creditor might not be willing to give him extension, but because if it got rumored about that he was in failing circumstances, some one creditor would step in and by summary process seek to get the major portion of the estate. Under this law it is possible for a debtor to deal in candor with his creditors. It is possible for him to present his condition, and say: "I am temporarily embarrassed, but if given an opportunity I can get on my feet; I can go forward and pay all my debts."

We had a recent illustration of it in the late panic. I say to you that if it had not been for this law you would have had that panic lasting twice as long as it did, and it would have been ten-fold more severe. A man who was temporarily embarrassed, and nearly all men were embarrassed in those days of doubt and distress, when assets were crumbling, when credits were failing, when demands were made upon all that none could immediately meet. In those days, I say, a man who was honest was able to say to his creditors: "While I am temporarily embarrassed, I will be able to get on my feet if you will give me a chance." He was given a chance, and many and many a man to-day holds his head up in the face of the world as a successful merchant who would have been driven into insolvency if you had had the old rule that "to the diligent creditor shall the estate be given." [Applause.] No one of the creditors would have dared to wait, because it would have enabled every other creditor to rush in.

But we are told, forsooth, that this law ought not to stay on the statute books, because it is imperfect, and its imperfections are acknowledged by this proposal to amend it. Since when did we ever have a perfect law on the statute books? Since when was it that the insolvency of the State that these gentlemen would have us go back to did not require amendment? I suggest that it would be more in accord with high service to the House for men to undertake to perfect the law, to cure its imperfections, than simply to say, because it is not perfect, therefore we will have none of it. [Applause.] It is not a perfect law, but I deny that it is a law that has wasted estates; I deny that it is a law that in its administration is more expensive than the state insolvency laws. I deny that it is a law, as stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY], that prevents any man helping a failing debtor. Why, the gentleman made the statement on this floor as if it was the law that if a man wanted to lend money to a failing debtor, he could not lend the money and take security for it, when the very act that he was condemning has an express provision in it that to the extent of present consideration liens may be given and accepted in good faith, and they are held inviolate under the provisions of this act.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. To say that the gentleman from Georgia, who was unavoidably taken away, and is not present——

Mr. SHERLEY. I thought the gentleman wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. CLAYTON. I wanted to ask the gentleman——

Mr. SHERLEY. I would rather go on with my remarks, but just ask the question.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is to say, does the gentleman think that any man who in failing circumstances goes to a man who has money, within four months of his failure, and says to him: "I am about to fail; I am in an embarrassed position; let me have a thousand dollars and I will prefer you." Do you think that any sane man, if this bankruptcy law remains on the books, will let him have that thousand dollars?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say, if you will read the law, you will find the express provision that he can get a thousand dollars and give security for it, and there is not the slightest reason why a man should not lend it if he wants to.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is my answer; I am not going to answer it as the gentleman wants, but I have answered it according to the law. I must decline to yield.

Mr. CLAYTON. If the gentleman will not be so much in earnest and a little more dispassionate——

Mr. SHERLEY. Permit me to make my speech. After I make it you may make such criticism of my manner as you choose. I insist on consuming my own time.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman can not.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am very sorry that the gentleman's argument is so vulnerable that he can not submit to an interruption.

Mr. SHERLEY. I demand my time.

Mr. CLAYTON. If you want to run away from an honest argument, well and good.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman can convince the House that I have ever run away from one of his arguments, he is welcome to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I suppose the gentleman has reference to the present law, which provides that liens created in good faith for a present consideration shall not be affected by the act, and has amended the proposition to have security good to the extent of the present consideration only, and that is proposed to meet the decisions of some of the courts that a security given not only for a present consideration, but also for a debt formerly existing, was good if given in good faith for the entire debt.

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with you that under the present law, where a loan was made of a certain sum, the security given may be not only for that sum, but for a preceding debt, but the existing provision fully covers the proposition made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] and insisted upon by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. May I ask another question? I thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Then the effect of that amendment would be that if a man owed a thousand dollars and he borrowed another thousand dollars from the same creditor, he could only give security for the new loan?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably, because that is the only present consideration.

Now, taking up again the law in its main features, much has been said, and sneeringly said, about organizations of men who are supporting this law, that the referees, receivers, and assignees have been the men chiefly concerned in it. It is true that the amendments I offer here represent not only my judgment, but the judgment of the referees of bankruptcy of the country, and I have no apology to make to this House for asking aid of the men best qualified in America to furnish aid in preparing amendments to make it a proper law. These men are engaged daily in the administration of the law. They know the decisions; they know the way the law has worked. Why, it is the law in some of the States that the judiciary shall give to the legislative body information and make suggestions as to the amendments that should be made in existing statutes. We do not come here asking you to take these amendments because of the sponsors for them. We ask you to take them because they are right; and if any man can show that they are not right, let him speak; but let him not use the time of the House in abusing men whose arguments he can not answer. [Applause.] What I ask is consideration of the bankruptcy law on its merits. If I wanted to make an argument as to who favored the repeal of the law, I might tell you that the clerks of the state courts who no longer get the fees, that the little coterie that hung around the court-house and bought the attachments and no longer get the suits, are the people who are clamoring for the repeal of the bankruptcy law. If you are going to listen to a trivial argument of this kind, take both sides of it.

Now, there is another statement made, never definitely, but by implication, that it is within the power of creditors to seize a debtor's estate, to throw a debtor into bankruptcy, and absolutely ruin him when he is a perfectly solvent man. Yet any man who had read the bankruptcy law would know that that could not be done. The grounds for bringing a petition in involuntary bankruptcy are clearly stated. A bond is required of the petitioning creditors who file the petition. If the court determines upon a hearing that the man is not insolvent, those petitioning creditors and their bondsmen are liable for damages; and yet men would have you believe that it is possible for any number of men to grab an honest debtor, irrespective of his assets, and throw him into bankruptcy. They rail at one time that it enables a man to get free of his debts, and they rail at another time that it enables a creditor to absolutely coerce the payment of a debt by harsh methods.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman spoke a moment ago about bonds being given by petitioning creditors. Can he recall a single instance where there ever was a recovery on one of those bonds?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know that I can recall an instance, but that does not prove anything one way or another. If it proves anything, it probably proves that the fellow proceeded against was insolvent and was adjudged a bankrupt, and ought to have been. Of course I am not familiar with all the cases in the bankruptcy court, and do not pretend to be.

Mr. CLAYTON. Did the gentleman ever have any case in any bankruptcy court in his life?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes. Of course I have not had the extensive practice of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. CLAYTON. Which you admitted——

Mr. SHERLEY. But I have practiced occasionally in the courts. [Laughter.] I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I have said all that it may be necessary to say in regard to the general purpose of this law, except to call attention to this curious fact, that in the article of the Constitution (Art. VIII) relating to the powers of Congress, the fourth enumerated subject in that article will be found to give to Congress the power to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy. Now, observe this important fact: At the time the Constitution was adopted such a thing as a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, whereby a debtor of his own volition could file a petition and be relieved of his debts, was unknown to the practice of the whole world. The first bankruptcy law that ever permitted that was a law passed in 1825 in England, and the first in America was in 1841. Now, the importance of that is this, that it shows that the makers of the Constitution in putting in the provision that they did in regard to bankruptcy had in mind not simply the release of the debtor, but they had in mind the establishment of a uniform rule whereby preferences should be done away with in the distribution of insolvent debtors' estates.

That is the real fundamental purpose, and it is because of that purpose that that law ought to be a permanent law on the statute book. You say that the other laws have not been permanent. That is true. The other laws were fatally defective in some cases, unduly expensive, and the mistake was made, instead of perfecting them, in complying with the advice of men who thought, as some of my opponents now think, that the law should be repealed, and every time it has been repealed the country has been forced back into an enactment of a new law. If we repeal the national bankrupt law, we take ourselves out of the galaxy of the great nations like England, France, Germany, the great commercial nations of the world, and put ourselves in the class with China and the small backward nations of the earth. Now, if that be a wise move, all right; in my judgment nothing could be more fatal.

Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored to answer the argument of those who favor the repeal of this law. Let me now, in conclusion, briefly state in an affirmative way some of the many reasons why I believe we should maintain a permanent bankruptcy law.

To properly do this the law must be considered as it relates to voluntary petitions—those instituted by the debtor himself—and then in its relation to proceedings brought at the instance of the creditors of a debtor.

Time was when a debtor could be thrown into prison for debt, but the enlightenment of men soon put an end to such a barbarous practice. And that same enlightenment necessarily forced the conviction that it was no more in the interest of society to destroy the usefulness of one of its members by leaving round his neck the millstone of debts that could not be paid, no matter how much he might strive to liquidate them, than it had been to actually imprison him.

Such a man, bowed down by a weight that can not be lifted, subject to an attack from a creditor whenever he may make the least start toward his own uplift, presents one of the most pathetic pictures possible. Of value neither to himself, his creditors, nor to society, death alone can hold out any relief. If it was true that insolvency came only as a result of wrongdoing, as was once urged by those defending the law authorizing imprisonment for debt, I could understand, even if I did not justify, a condition of society that permitted such a life handicap as a punishment. But all men know that insolvency comes more often from accident or from an inferior endowment of that talent needed in the keen competition of modern life than from actual wrongdoing. And this is so apparent that all nowadays favor at some time a law that can relieve the debtor and give him a fresh start in life, and this, under our system of government, can only be done by a national law. To my mind the justification for such a law at any time is a justification for it at all times. It is true that thereby some men may be relieved of debt who should not, but under a law properly safeguarded their number is negligible in comparison to the many who always do in justice need the law, and society as a whole is infinitely bettered.

But, Mr. Speaker, while I believe in the voluntary features of the law, and have endeavored briefly to justify them, I desire to repeat that it was to give the Federal Government power to have uniformly administered the assets of an insolvent debtor that the bankruptcy clause was placed in the Constitution. Were it possible to have uniform and absolutely equitable insolvency laws in each State, the need of the involuntary system would, in large measure, cease; but the makers of the Constitution were judges of human nature; they knew from bitter experience that individual States would endeavor to favor their own citizens as against those of sister States. Provision after provision is to be found in the Constitution looking to prevent this favoritism, and not the least important is that for uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy.

And that the fathers were justified in this course is amply shown by the various insolvency laws of the different States. Without a national law the foreign creditor is at the mercy of his debtor and home creditors in many of the States. That interstate trade that is essential to the material welfare of our country can only be had in full measure by assuring to capital everywhere in our common country equality of treatment. Credits are dependent upon it; interest rates obey it as the needle the magnetic pole. No great commercial nation of the world but that has learned in the bitter school of experience that commerce is only possible where trade conditions are stable and uniform. Not one of these nations but that has a permanent bankruptcy law. For inasmuch as commercial failures are inseparable from commerce, there must be settlement of estates of insolvent debtors, and this, if that equality which is justice is to be maintained, must be under a permanent uniform law.

The rich man and the rich community may, in a measure, dispense with credit; the poor man and the poor State must obtain it to prosper. To these more than to any is the law a blessing. It gives the assurance necessary to warrant capital going abroad; it makes confidence between the embarrassed debtor and his creditors possible; it enables honorable creditors to unite in help to the honest debtor, and it removes from the avaricious any motive for oppression.

Safeguard the law from abuse by amendment from time to time as experience demonstrates the need, but above all, in the interest of the people of our country wherever situated, preserve it as the best guaranty of abundant credit and trade opportunity, as an indispensable aid to that equality and justice which should be the lodestar of our endeavor. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, I owe it to the House to explain, as far as the brief time allotted to me permits, the purposes of the amendments that I have proposed to the bill. I will have to proceed with considerable rapidity and therefore with some degree of shallowness of exposition, as some of the problems are intricate with which some of the amendments undertake to deal.

Now, as to the compensation that may be allowed and paid trustees: In place of the unlimited discretion that the courts have held they have as to such allowance, we have made a detailed schedule of allowance. We have taken the percentage allowance that is now given the trustees, and about which there has been no complaint, and made it the basis for the allowance of the receiver, both as to special and as to extraordinary compensation. It is to be noticed that in fixing this amount we have provided that that shall be the maximum, but we have not provided that it must be also the minimum. In other words, the courts can not allow more than we fix but it may allow much less, and if the facts in the case warrant it, the courts should allow and I trust will allow much less.

Then I have provided that all the federal courts shall have ancillary jurisdiction of suits brought in any of them. Some of the courts hold now under the law that they have ancillary jurisdiction and others deny it. This makes it clear. When a suit is brought in the district court of Kentucky and property of the debtor lies also in the State of Illinois or in Michigan or New York, it will be possible in these district courts to institute ancillary proceedings looking to the collection of the assets of the debtor without bringing direct new proceedings. Then it is provided that a corporation may become a voluntary bankrupt. Under existing law while a corporation may be made a defendant in an involuntary proceeding, it can not become a voluntary bankrupt. The result has been that when it finds itself insolvent it commits some act which is a ground for involuntary proceedings, and involuntary proceedings are then instituted against it. The effect of my amendment will be simply to permit the corporation to do directly what it does now indirectly, and therefore do away with the receiverships that frequently were necessary heretofore.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Does not the gentleman think it is bad policy to permit corporations chartered by the State to go into the bankruptcy court at all; that if they want to wind up as insolvents they should be under the jurisdiction of that sovereign power that gave them the charter?

Mr. SHERLEY. I see no objection to their going into the bankruptcy court, because bankruptcy does not relieve any stockholder or director of any liability placed on him by the act of incorporation under the law of the State.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. In my State there is a provision that if the corporation can not pay its current liabilities, proceedings may be had in the state courts to wind it up. Would the gentleman's amendment interfere with that law?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not necessarily, although under the law as it exists now, if a corporation is insolvent the creditors can put it into bankruptcy, and the only effect of my amendment is to permit it to go in voluntarily as well as to be put in by involuntary proceedings.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Would it deprive our state courts of jurisdiction?

Mr. SHERLEY. No more so that they are now deprived under the bankruptcy law.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I want to say that the circuit court of appeals, in a case from my city, decided where a corporation was carried into the state court before the bankruptcy proceedings were filed, for the purpose of winding it up, that the jurisdiction of the state court should be upheld.

Mr. SHERLEY. If that be the law, and I have no doubt it is as the gentleman has stated it to be, it is not changed in the slightest by my amendment. My next amendment undertakes to make a scientific classification of those who may be put into involuntary bankruptcy. As the bill was originally drawn, an effort was made to name in detail those individuals who were amenable to the law. Instead of stating the rule and then naming the exception, they simply reversed it, so that I provide that any "moneyed, business, or commercial corporations, excepting municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporations, may be put into involuntary bankruptcy."

The old law provided that "a corporation engaged principally in manufacturing, trading, printing, publishing, mining, or mercantile pursuits" could be put in bankruptcy, and the question then came up in the court as to what was meant by the word "principally," and you have some very strange decisions. For instance, they held in one case that a laundry company that laundered shirts for a shirt factory was engaged principally in manufacturing, but a laundry company that did laundering generally was not. So, instead of having them enumerated, I have adopted the scientific way of declaring a class and then stating the exceptions to the class.

Now, the next amendment ought to appeal even to the critics of the bankruptcy law. It provides that compositions between a debtor and creditors may be had before adjudication as well as afterwards. Under the decisions of the court at present it has been held that a man must be declared a bankrupt before a composition may be had in settlement of his estate. This permits a composition, which is an arrangement brought about by a majority of the creditors with the debtor and which compels the acquiescence of the rest of the creditors—there must be both a majority in number and a majority in amount, to be made before adjudication in bankruptcy as well as afterwards. The effect of that will be, we believe, to permit many settlements between honest debtors and creditors, without going through all the expense of a court proceeding, and will help to quickly settle insolvent estates. The next amendment is the one that is criticised by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], and, if I may be permitted to state, incorrectly stated by him. The present law names six grounds for refusing a discharge in bankruptcy. The provision has nothing to do with the commission of a crime; it has nothing to do with punishing a man for a crime, as stated; but there are six grounds for refusing a man his discharge in bankruptcy. One of those grounds is this:

> Obtain property on credit from any person upon a materially false statement in writing, made to such person for the purpose of obtaining such property on credit.

That has been amended to read in this way:

> Obtain money or property on credit upon a materially false statement in writing, made by him to any person for the purpose of obtaining credit or of being communicated to the trade or to the person from whom he obtained such property on credit.

The difference is this: Under the existing law the false statement had to be made to the man who gave the credit. If it was made to A and the credit was given by B, some of the courts have held that it was not a ground to prevent the discharge. We have provided that if property is so obtained it shall prevent the discharge. Mind you, money or property must be obtained, it must be obtained on credit, and it must be obtained on credit upon a materially false statement. If that statement is made for the purpose of being communicated to the trade, can the man who knowingly makes a false statement in writing to get a credit complain? What other justice can he expect? Those who go into equity must go with clean hands. This can affect only the dishonest man, only the man who is trying to get something by holding out a false representation to the country; and I say that whether it be made to Dun or Bradstreets or to John Doe or Richard Roe, if it is made for the purpose of getting credit and is a materially false statement, and thereby the man does get credit, he is not entitled to the beneficial effects of the bankruptcy law and ought to have his discharge refused him.

The next section is purely technical. There are three sections that undertake to provide for the recovery of certain character of property, and they state that the state and federal courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction; but when it came to authorize the trustee to bring that class of suits, it did not carry into it the provision also giving concurrent jurisdiction to both state and federal courts, and what I have done here was simply to make plain that the state and federal courts had concurrent jurisdiction in this character of cases.

The next amendment is very vital and important. The present law says, speaking of the trustees:

> Collect and reduce to money the property of the estates for which they are trustees under the direction of the court, and close up the estate as expeditiously as is compatible with the best interests of the parties in interest.

I have added to that this language:

> And such trustees, as to all property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies, and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon, and also, as to all property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies, and powers of a judgment creditor holding an execution duly returned unsatisfied.

Now, the reason for that was this: The Supreme Court, in the case of York against Cassell, held that the title of the trustee was simply the title of the debtor; that he took no more title than an assignee does under the law; that he stood in the shoes of the assignor, and that if the bankrupt could not object or recover property or set aside a transfer the trustee could not, because he had no better title than the bankrupt had. Well, the effect of that was this: The creditors were prevented from setting aside a conveyance or transfer that might be voidable as to them, because the bankruptcy court had taken possession and they were no longer free to act and the trustee could not, because he had no better title than the bankrupt, and so in order to remedy that and to prevent the evil of secret liens we provide that the trustee shall have just the title that any creditor would have had if the bankruptcy proceedings had not been instituted. He can then recover this property for the benefit of all the creditors and prevent one creditor getting an undue share by preference. Now, the next amendments relate to the compensation, and that I have already spoken of——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for its attention. [Applause.]

In further explanation of the amendments, I subjoin a statement showing in detail the changes proposed and the reasons therefor:

Proposed amendments to the national bankruptcy act as contained in the Sherley bill (H. R. 20575).

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 2, CLAUSE 5.

PRESENT LAW.[a]	PROPOSED AMENDMENT.[b]
Authorize the business of bankrupts to be conducted for limited periods by receivers, the marshals, or trustees, if necessary in the best interests of the estates, and allow such officers additional compensation for such services [but not at a greater rate than in this act allowed trustees for similar services].	Authorize the business of bankrupts to be conducted for limited periods by receivers, the marshals, or trustees, if necessary in the best interests of the estates, and allow such officers additional compensation for such services, as provided in section 48 of this act.

NOTE.—The act of 1898, as originally passed, gave no additional compensation to the receiver, marshal, nor trustee, for conducting the business. This was an injustice, which the amendment of 1903 sought to correct, by an amendment of section 2, clause 5 of the act—a part of the statute, by the way, not germane to the subject of compensation. Through the unfortunate wording of the amendment of 1903, especially through the use of the word "similar," this clause regarding compensation was ambiguous. It was the intention of the framers of the amendment of 1903 that, where the trustee, receiver, or marshal conducted the business, he might be allowed additional compensation not to exceed once again the ordinary compensation prescribed in section 48 of the law, section 48 carefully limiting the compensation of the trustee to certain fixed percentages upon moneys disbursed.

The courts construed the amendment of 1903 as allowing additional compensation, but, especially in the case of receivers (as to whom no method was prescribed for determining these commissions where property was turned over by them in specie to the trustee), it was held that there was no limit upon the amount allowable. Had the word "similar" been left out altogether it would have been much plainer; but even then it would have been difficult to fix any limit in the case of receivers as to commissions, since a great deal of the property in receivership cases is turned over to the trustee in specie.

The proposed amendment to section 2, clause 5, simply refers the entire question of compensation to the more appropriate section 48, making a new clause (e) in that section.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 2, CLAUSE 19.

PRESENT LAW.	PROPOSED AMENDMENT.[b]
(19) Transfer cases to other courts of bankruptcy.	(19) Transfer cases to other courts of bankruptcy; and (20) exercise ancillary jurisdiction over persons or property within their respective territorial limits in aid of a receiver or trustee appointed in any bankruptcy proceedings pending in any other court of bankruptcy.

NOTE.—Here it is proposed to confer on district courts, by statute, ancillary jurisdiction of bankruptcy proceedings pending in any other district court. Such jurisdiction was conceded under the law of 1867 by the decision of the Supreme Court in Lathrop v. Drake (91 U. S., 516); but has not been recognized by some decisions under the present act. Some courts assert it; others refuse to do so. Such refusal has resulted in much hardship, as it tends to leave in doubt the efficient protection of assets of bankrupts which happen to be in some jurisdiction other than that of the adjudication.

Reference is made to In re Williams (123 Fed., 321), Ross-Mehan Foundry Company v. Southern Car and Foundry Company (124 Fed., 493), In re Tybo, etc., Company (132 Fed., 697), In re Hartz (142 Fed., 726), Hall v. Burr (153 Fed., 945), denying jurisdiction; and In re Sutter Brothers (131 Fed., 654), Lawrence v. Lowrie (133 Fed., 995), and In re Benedict (410 Fed., 55), asserting it.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 4, SUBDIVISION A.

PRESENT LAW.	PROPOSED AMENDMENT.[b]
4. Who may become bankrupts.	4. Who may become bankrupts.
(a) Any person who owes debts, except a corporation, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act as a voluntary bankrupt.	(a) Any person who owes debts, except a municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporation, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act as a voluntary bankrupt.

The object of this amendment is to permit the voluntary bankruptcy of corporations. The great majority of corporate bankruptcies at the present time are cases where the corporations have committed no act of bankruptcy except the so-called act of bankruptcy denominated "Written admission," that is to say, where the corporation has "admitted in writing its inability to pay its debts and its willingness to be adjudged a bankrupt on that ground" [Bankruptcy act, §3-a (5)]. Of course, this act of bankruptcy furnishes merely a roundabout way for a corporation voluntarily to go into bankruptcy. There is no reason why a corporation should not be entitled to go directly into bankruptcy as a voluntary bankrupt, for the benefit of its creditors, without this subterfuge and without the long and expensive preliminaries of the filing of an involuntary petition, the appointing of a receiver, etc. Corporations were entitled to become voluntary bankrupts under the previous bankruptcy act, and were so entitled under all other bankruptcy acts; and there seems to be no good reason for not allowing them to become voluntary bankrupts under the present act. The prohibition upon the voluntary bankruptcy of corporations has augmented the evil of expensive receiverships, and has put an additional burden of delay and expense upon the bankrupt estates, where the bankrupt is a corporation.

The voluntary bankruptcy of a corporation of course, as already provided in the act in the general terms of section 4 (b), does not release its officers, directors, or stockholders from any liability under the laws of a State, or Territory, or of the United States; but, so far as that is concerned, a bankrupt corporation seldom, if ever, even asks for a discharge, a discharge being superfluous in cases of corporate bankruptcy.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 4, SUBDIVISION B.

b. Any natural person, except a wage-earner or a person engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil, any unincorporated company, [and any corporation engaged principally in manufacturing, trading, printing, publishing, mining, or mercantile pursuits] owing debts to the amount of one thousand dollars or over, may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon default or an impartial trial, and shall be subject to the provisions and entitled to the benefits of this act. [Private bankers, but not national banks or banks incorporated under state or territorial laws, may be adjudged involuntary bankrupts.] The bankruptcy of a corporation shall not release its officers, directors, or stockholders, as such, from any liability under the laws of a State or Territory or of the United States.	b. Any natural person, except a wage-earner or a person engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil, any unincorporated company, and any moneyed, business, or commercial corporation, except a municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporation, owing debts to the amount of one thousand dollars or over, may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon default or an impartial trial, and shall be subject to the provisions and entitled to the benefits of this act. The bankruptcy of a corporation shall not release its officers, directors, or stockholders as such, from any liability under the laws of a State or Territory or of the United States.

NOTE.—The changes here are intended to broaden the present law so far as it affects corporations. As the law now stands only corporations "engaged principally in manufacturing, trading, printing, publishing, mining, or mercantile pursuits" can be proceeded against by creditors. There is no good reason for these distinctions. The law, as it now stands, leads to much litigation as to what corporations are included in the enumerated classes, and thus to confusion and the wasting of assets. Some rather amazing distinctions have been made by the courts. In New York a corporation which constructs bridges and piers is liable to bankruptcy (In re Niagara Construction Co., 127 Fed., 782), but in Virginia a corporation engaged in quite similar work is not (In re MacNicholl Construction Co., 134 Fed., 979); a hotel corporation, which also runs a barroom, is amenable (In re Barton Hotel Co., 12 A. B. R., 335), but a restaurant corporation, which also runs a barroom, is not (In re Chesapeake Oyster and Fish Co., 112 Fed., 960); a laundry company which launders new shirts, collars, and cuffs for a company that manufactures them is amenable (In re Troy Steam Laundry Co., 132 Fed., 266), but a similar company, doing a general laundry business, is not (In re White Star Laundry Co., 117 Fed., 570); while it has been held that a company which reservoirs and buys water for distribution to its customers can not be adjudged a bankrupt (In re New York and Westchester Water Co., 98 Fed., 711), and yet a company which gathers and buys ice for the same purpose may be so adjudged (First National Bank v. Wyoming Ice Co., 136 Fed., 466); again, a corporation making new automobiles is subject to bankruptcy as a manufacturing corporation, while one which simply repairs automobiles, even though supplying parts thereto, is not subject thereto (Cate v. Connell, 173 Fed., 445; 23 A. B. R., 73, C. C. A.).

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 12, SUBDIVISION A.

A bankrupt may offer terms of composition to his creditors after, but not before, he has been examined in open court or at a meeting of his creditors and filed in court the schedule of his property and list of his creditors, required to be filed by bankrupts.	A bankrupt may offer, either before or after adjudication, terms of composition to his creditors after, but not before, he has been examined in open court or at a meeting of his creditors, and has filed in court the schedule of his property and the list of his creditors, required to be filed by bankruptcy. In compositions before adjudication the bankrupt shall file the required schedules, and thereupon the court shall call a meeting of creditors for the allowance of claims, examination of the bankrupt, and preservation or conduct of estates, at which meeting the judge or referee shall preside; and action upon the petition for adjudication shall be delayed until it shall be determined whether such composition shall be confirmed.

NOTE.—This section is new, but the reasons for it are convincing. Under the law of 1867, as amended in 1874, compositions could be had both before and after adjudications of bankruptcy. Under the present act, however, such an adjudication, with the stigma which results, must be had before there can be a composition. Section 3 of the English bankruptcy act of 1890 (53 and 54 Vict., c. 71) provides for what are technically called "schemes of arrangement," and permits creditors in that country to compose with their debtors, under the supervision of the court, but without an actual bankruptcy. This provision, therefore, stimulates official settlements, compulsory upon all creditors, when a given proportion in number and amount shall have assented. These schemes of arrangement are very common in England. Here compositions are growing in favor, but, being held to be impossible until after an adjudication, which in the case of involuntary bankruptcies is often considerably delayed, are availed of much less than they should be. Hence the bill would permit official settlements between creditors and debtor, immediately after the filing even of an involuntary petition, on notice and a proper investigation by the court; and thus, in effect, not only prevent the debtor being stigmatized as a bankrupt, but accomplish speedy settlements with creditors, at present rarely possible in any other way. It is thought, too, that the plan will greatly decrease the expenses of court administration, and thus both creditors and debtors be induced to avail themselves of it.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 14, SUBDIVISION B.

The judge shall hear the application for a discharge, and such proofs and pleas as may be made in opposition thereto by parties in interest, at such time as will give parties in interest a reasonable opportunity to be fully heard, and investigate the merits of the application and discharge the applicant unless he has (1) committed an offense punishable by imprisonment as herein provided; or (2) with intent to conceal his financial condition, destroyed, concealed, or failed to keep books of account or records from which such condition might be ascertained; or (3) obtained property on credit [from any person] upon a materially false statement in writing made to [such] person for the purpose of obtaining [such property on] credit; or (4) at any time subsequent to the first day of the four months immediately preceding the filing of the petition transferred, removed, destroyed, or concealed, or permitted to be removed, destroyed, or concealed, any of his property with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors; or (5) in voluntary proceedings been granted a discharge in bankruptcy within six years; or (6) in the course of the proceedings in bankruptcy refused to obey any lawful order of or to answer any material question approved by the court.	The judge shall hear the application for a discharge, and such proofs and pleas as may be made in opposition thereto by the trustee or other parties in interest, at such time as will give the trustee or parties in interest a reasonable opportunity to be fully heard, and investigate the merits of the application and discharge the applicant, unless he has (1) committed an offense punishable by imprisonment as herein provided; or (2) with intent to conceal his financial condition, destroyed, concealed, or failed to keep books of account or records from which such condition might be ascertained; or (3) obtained money or property on credit upon a materially false statement in writing, made by him to any person for the purpose of obtaining credit or of being communicated to the trade or to the person from whom he obtained such property on credit; or (4) at any time subsequent to the first day of the four months immediately preceding the filing of the petition transferred, removed, destroyed, or concealed, or permitted to be removed, destroyed, or concealed, any of his property with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors; or (5) in voluntary proceedings been granted a discharge in bankruptcy within six years; or (6) in the course of the proceedings in bankruptcy refused to obey any lawful order of, or to answer any material question approved by, the court: Provided, that a trustee shall not interpose objections to a bankrupt's discharge until he shall be authorized so to do at a meeting of creditors called for that purpose.

NOTE.—It is generally admitted that the law as originally passed was weak in so far as it tended to prevent the discharge of dishonest debtors. It was much strengthened by the amendments of 1903. It should be still more strengthened. First, by settling beyond peradventure that the trustee is sufficiently a party in interest to object to a discharge; second, by making the giving of a false mercantile statement in writing as a basis of credit an objection to a discharge.

As to the first: The weight of authority is that the trustee may not, under the law as it now stands, oppose the bankrupt's discharge. Objections have to be filed, if filed at all, by individual creditors and asserted at their expense. If the trustee, as the representative of all of the creditors, can assert those objections, the expense can be spread over all, and thus many fraudulent bankrupts be refused discharges who otherwise would escape. Creditors are protected against an improper use of their funds by the new proviso clause at the end of the section.

As to the second: The clause which was in Judge Ray's original bill in the Fifty-sixth Congress, is suggested again. It was slightly changed in his bill in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and was very much modified before the bill passed. Indeed, it is now an open question whether a false credit statement, to be available as an objection to a discharge, must not have been made to the creditor who extended the credit and at the time of the extension of such credit. To this effect is In re Allendorf (129 Fed., 981), and, to the opposite effect, In re Dresser (13 Am. B. R., 616) (as affirmed in 146 Fed., 383), and In re Pincus (147 Fed., 621).

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 23, SUBDIVISION B.

Suits by the trustee shall only be brought or prosecuted in the courts where the bankrupt whose estate is being administered by such trustee might have brought or prosecuted them if proceedings in bankruptcy had not been instituted, unless by consent of the proposed defendant, except suits for the recovery of property under section 60, subdivision b, [and] section 67, subdivision e.	Suits by the trustee shall only be brought or prosecuted in the courts where the bankrupt whose estate is being administered by such trustee might have brought or prosecuted them if proceedings in bankruptcy had not been instituted, unless by consent of the proposed defendant, except suits for the recovery of property under section 60, subdivision b; section 67, subdivision e; and section 70, subdivision e.

NOTE.—The change here would give effect to the last sentence of section 70-e of the present law, which provided, "For the purpose of such recovery—i. e., of property the transfer of which could have been avoided by a creditor—any court of bankruptcy as hereinbefore defined, and any state court which would have had jurisdiction if bankruptcy had not intervened, shall have concurrent jurisdiction." Such sentence was added by the amendatory act of 1903. The same words were then also added to sections 60-b and 67-e. To make the change effective, a corresponding change was necessary in section 23-b, but for some reason the words "and section 70, subdivision e" were stricken from the amendatory bill. They should be restored, so as to make the statute consistent and obviate the controversy as to whether suits to set aside fraudulent transfers that are not technically preferences can be brought in the federal district courts. (See Gregory v. Atkinson, 127 Fed., 183, and Skewis v. Barthell, 152 Fed., 534.)

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 47, CLAUSE 2, SUBDIVISION A.

PRESENT LAW.	PROPOSED AMENDMENT.[a]
Collect and reduce to money the property of the estates for which they are trustees, under the direction of the court, and close up the estate as expeditiously as is compatible with the best interests of the parties in interest.	Collect and reduce to money the property of the estates for which they are trustees, under the direction of the court, and close up the estate as expeditiously as is compatible with the best interests of the parties in interest; and such trustees, as to all property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies, and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon; and, also, as to all property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies, and powers of a judgment creditor holding an execution duly returned unsatisfied.

NOTE.—One of the most important decisions under the present law is York Manufacturing Company v. Cassell (201 U. S., 344), wherein it was held that property covered by an unrecorded instrument which would have been void under the state law, had the property been taken by an assignee or receiver in the state courts, or levied upon by attachment or execution, was not void where the possession of the property was taken by a receiver or trustee in bankruptcy, the Supreme Court holding that the trustee stood precisely in the bankrupt's shoes with regard to the unrecorded instrument, even though under the state law had the seizure been made by a state court assignee in insolvency or receiver, or by the sheriff under execution or attachment, the unrecorded lien would have been void as against creditors. By this ruling the trustee in bankruptcy is by the law, as it now stands, held to be vested solely with the bankrupt's own title except as to property fraudulently transferred and as to property which (within four months of the bankruptcy) has been seized by a creditor by legal proceedings or voluntarily transferred to him by way of a preference. The trustee, under the present law, does not take the rights of a creditor, then, except as to fraudulently transferred property or as to property seized by legal proceedings within four months of the bankruptcy by creditors or preferentially transferred to them by the bankrupt during that period. In this way a distinct advantage is given to the holders of unrecorded liens. The creditors' hands meanwhile are tied from making any levy, because the separate rights of the creditors have become vested in the trustee for all, besides which, as to property already in the custody of the bankruptcy court, of course individual creditors would be in contempt of court should they levy thereon. Thus, the evil of secret liens has continued. It is this evil and the injustice worked upon creditors who rely upon the debtor's apparent ownership against which the bankruptcy law has set its face.

The proposed amendment, while correcting the defect named, at the same time carefully guards the rights of all parties. It is evident that in the proposed amendment attempt is made to give effect to two ideas, quite distinct: First, that as to the property in the custody of the bankruptcy court the bankruptcy trustee shall be considered to have the same title that a creditor holding an execution or other lien by legal or equitable proceedings levied upon that property would have under state law; and, second, that as to property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, the trustee should stand in the position of a judgment creditor holding an execution returned unsatisfied, thus entitling him to proceed precisely as an individual creditor might have done to subject assets. In this way, in effect, proceedings in bankruptcy will give to creditors the same rights that creditors under the state law would have had had there been no bankruptcy, and from which they are debarred by the bankruptcy—certainly a very desirable and eminently fair position to be granted to the trustee.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 48, TO BE CALLED SUBDIVISION D.

PRESENT LAW.	PROPOSED AMENDMENT.[a]
No subdivision d in present law.	d. Receivers or marshals appointed pursuant to section two, subdivision three of this act, shall receive for their services, payable after they are rendered, compensation by way of commissions upon the moneys disbursed by them, and also upon the moneys turned over by them or afterwards realized from property turned over in specie by them to the trustee, or upon money or property turned over to creditors or to the bankrupt, alleged bankrupt, or other person under order of the court, as the court may allow, not to exceed six per cent on the first five hundred dollars or less, four per cent on moneys in excess of five hundred dollars and less than one thousand five hundred dollars, two per cent on moneys in excess of one thousand five hundred dollars and less than ten thousand dollars, and one per cent on moneys in excess of ten thousand dollars: Provided, That in cases of the confirmation of a composition such commissions shall not exceed one-half of one per cent of the amount to be paid creditors on such compositions: Provided further, That before the allowance of compensation notice of application therefor, specifying the amount asked, shall be given to creditors in the manner indicated in section fifty-eight of this act.

NOTE.—The developing evils against which the amendment is directed have been increasing. The original law, even after it was amended in 1903, did not in terms limit the fees of receivers, though the fees of all other officers were fixed by the statute. Receivers are often necessary; sometimes they are mere custodians and remain in possession, at most, a couple of weeks. At other times, where the adjudication is contested, they remain in possession, perhaps conducting a going business, for months. Clearly they should receive no more for their work, no matter how long they serve, than trustees receive for similar work. They are officers doing the same kind of work as the trustees, and if the trustees' compensation is limited, so also should be their compensation. In actual practice, however, receivers are usually allowed much more. Clearly, too, those receivers who are mere custodians should receive much less than the percentages allowed to trustees for converting and distributing assets. The problem has been much discussed, and the difficulty has led to the promulgation in certain of the districts of rules intended to meet it (thus, see Rule 9, northern district of Illinois, 140 Fed., 5). There is, however, no uniformity and much complaint.

That the amendment of section 2 (5) of the law, made by the amendatory act of 1903, did not accomplish its purpose, but rather increased existing confusion, is indicated in In re Richards (127 Fed., 772) and In re Sully (133 Fed., 997). Subdivision (d) of section 48, as now proposed to be amended, will permit the allowance to receivers whose work has been long and arduous of the same compensation as allowed to trustees; but, by a requiring notice to creditors stating the amount asked for, would tend to check similar allowances where the receiver has been merely a custodian, and by setting maximum limits will prevent the exorbitant allowances which now are unfortunately so prevalent in some localities. It will be noted that the basis upon which the percentages are to be reckoned is the actual value realized and not the inventory value. The reason for this is apparent.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 48, TO BE CALLED SUBDIVISION E.

PRESENT LAW.	PROPOSED AMENDMENT.[a]
No subdivision e in present law.	e. Where the business is conducted by trustees, marshals, or receivers, as provided in clause five of section two of this act, the court may allow such officers additional compensation for such services by way of commissions upon the moneys disbursed by them; and, in cases of receivers or marshals, also upon the moneys turned over by them or afterwards realized from property turned over in specie by them to the trustees or upon money or property turned over to creditors, or to the bankrupt, alleged bankrupt, or other person under order of the court, such commissions not to exceed six per cent on the first five hundred dollars or less, four per cent on moneys in excess of five hundred dollars and less than one thousand five hundred dollars, two per cent on moneys in excess of one thousand five hundred dollars and less than ten thousand dollars, and one per cent on moneys in excess of ten thousand dollars: Provided, That in case of the confirmation of a composition such commission shall not exceed one-half of one per cent of the amount to be paid creditors on such composition: Provided further, That before the allowance of compensation notice of application therefor, specifying the amount asked, shall be given to creditors in the manner indicated in section fifty-eight of this act.

NOTE.—As heretofore remarked, in the note to the proposed amendment to section 2, clause 5, the act of 1898 as originally passed gave no additional compensation to the receiver, trustee, or marshal for conducting the business. This was an injustice, which the amendment of 1903 sought to correct by an amendment to section 2, clause 5. [This part of the statute, by the way, is not germane to the subject of compensation, for which reason it is now proposed to treat of the entire subject of compensation in its appropriate place, section 48.]

Through the unfortunate wording of this amendment of 1903 to this section 2, clause 5, regarding additionnl compensation for the conducting of the business, especially through the use of the word "similar," the amendatory clause was rendered ambiguous. It was the intention of the framers of the amendment of 1903 that, where the trustee, receiver, or marshal conducted the business, he might be allowed additional compensation not to exceed once again the ordinary compensation prescribed in section 48 of the law, section 48 carefully limiting the compensation of the trustee to certain fixed percentages upon moneys disbursed.

The courts construed the amendment of 1903 as allowing additional compensation, but, especially in the case of receivers (as to whom no method was prescribed for determining these commissions where property was turned over by them in specie to the trustee), it was held that there was no limit upon the amount allowable. Had the word "similar" been left out altogether, it would have been much plainer, but, even then, it would have been difficult to fix any limit in the case of receivers as to commissions, since a great deal of the property in receivership cases is turned over to the trustee in specie.

The proposed amendment, clause e, to section 48, preserving as it does additional compensation for conducting the business and at the same time affording a rule for the computation of commissions upon property turned over in specie by receivers and marshals to the trustee, will afford a practicable, just, workable, and eminently satisfactory solution of the vexed question of additional compensation for the conducting of business in bankruptcy.

It is of quite as vital importance that the additional compensation of receivers, trustees, and marshals for conducting the business be placed upon a percentage basis as that the compensation of trustees for the performance of their ordinary duties shall be so placed. The evils of leaving such additional compensation to the discretion of the courts are too obvious and well known to require explanation. The amendment will also tend to prevent long-drawn-out receiverships.

It is to be further observed that this additional compensation is not necessarily to be allowed in full; less, but not more, can be allowed, as the court may direct.

It will also be noticed that the rate of commissions prescribed in proposed amendment, clause e, to section 48, as additional compensation for conducting the business, is the same as that prescribed for the ordinary compensation of trustees in section 48a of the act and of receivers in proposed amendment, section 48d.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 59, SUBDIVISION G.

A voluntary or involuntary petition shall not be dismissed by the petitioner or petitioners or for want of prosecution or by consent of parties until after notice to the creditors.	A voluntary or involuntary petition shall not be dismissed by the petitioner or petitioners or for want of prosecution or by consent of parties until after notice to the creditors, and to that end the court shall, before entertaining an application for dismissal, require the bankrupt to file a list, under oath, of all his creditors, with their addresses, and shall cause notice to be sent to all such creditors of the pendency of such application, and shall delay the hearing thereon for a reasonable time to allow all creditors and parties in interest opportunity to be heard.

NOTE.—It is clearly the law now that involuntary petitions can not be dismissed without the regular ten-day notice to all creditors, but there is no statutory provision requiring a debtor petitioned against to file a list of his creditors, so that such notice can be given. Hence, in several of the districts, the practice has grown up of dismissing involuntary petitions on the application of the alleged bankrupt and the consent of the petitioning creditors, merely on a pro forma proclamation in court. Such practice is indicated in In re Jemison Mercantile Company (112 Fed., 966), tolerated in In re Levi (142 Fed., 962); while the requirement of notice is flatly asserted in In re Plymouth Cordage Company (135 Fed., 1000). The amendment suggested merely gives point to what the law now is, by providing that a list of creditors shall be filed, so that the notice may be given.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 60, SUBDIVISION B.

PRESENT LAW.[b]	PROPOSED AMENDMENT.[a]
If a bankrupt shall have [given a preference, and the person receiving it, or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall have had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference], it shall be voidable by the trustee, and he may recover the property or its value from such person. And, for the purpose of such recovery, any court of bankruptcy, as hereinbefore defined, and any state court which would have had jurisdiction if bankruptcy had not intervened, shall have concurrent jurisdiction.	If a bankrupt shall have procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against him in favor of any person or have made a transfer of any of his property, and if, at the time of the transfer, or of the entry of the judgment, or of the recording or registering of the transfer if by law recording or registering thereof is required, and being within four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy or after the filing thereof and before the adjudication, the bankrupt be insolvent and the judgment or transfer then operate as a preference, and the person receiving it or to be benfited thereby or his agent acting therein, shall then have reasonable cause to believe that the enforcement of such judgment or transfer would effect a preference, it shall be voidable by the trustee and he may recover the property or its value from such person. And for the purpose of such recovery any court of bankruptcy, as hereinbefore defined, and any state court which would have had jurisdiction if bankruptcy had not intervened, shall have concurrent jurisdiction.

NOTE.—The object of this amendment is to protect against the evil of secret liens, against which evil this same section was amended in 1903, but in such an unfortunate way as not effectually to prevent such liens. As the present law stands, even as amended in 1903, secret liens are still being held good in many jurisdictions, notably in Wisconsin, where the supreme court of that State has held distinctly in the case of Clarige v. Evans (118 N. W., 198) that a mortgage withheld for years from record is not a preference, even if finally filed within a few days before bankruptcy, provided the debtor were not insolvent at the time it was given, years beforehand, or provided it were given for money then passing.

Thus, as the law stands, even by the amendment of 1903, as construed in many jurisdictions, a debtor may, if solvent at the time or if presently passing consideration be then received, give a chattel mortgage or other lien upon his property, requiring recording by the state law, and the creditor receiving it may keep this lien off the record for months, or even years—if not so done by agreement—and file it within a few days of bankruptcy, and yet the lien be held perfectly good. This is so held, because the courts rule that the insolvency of the debtor, the existence of a preexisting debt, and all the other elements of the preference are to be determined as of the date of the transfer between the parties. Thus, if at the date of the original giving of the chattel mortgage, the debtor was solvent or present consideration were then given, the transfer would not be a preference, no matter if the instrument be not recorded until within a few hours before the bankruptcy and with full knowledge of the debtor's impending failure. The amendment of 1903, by declaring the four months' period should not begin to run until the date of the recording where the recording is "required" by state law, evidently attempted to make the date of the recording the date at which the existence of insolvency, of a present consideration, and of all the other elements of the preference should be taken. Nevertheless, the amendment of 1903 did not effectually accomplish this object. Even if the recording be not done until within the four months' period, yet, if at the time of the original transfer, which might have occurred years beforehand, the debtor was solvent or the lien have been given upon a then presently passing consideration, the transfer will not be set aside as a preference; the date of the "transfer" under any theory always being necessarily the date at which all the elements of the preference must be proved to have existed.

The real trouble, it seems, is this: There are, in reality, two times of "transfers" in such cases. As between the transferror and transferee, obviously the time of transfer is the time of the original execution and delivery of the instrument to the grantee or transferee, regardless of its registration; but as to other creditors and the rest of the outer world, the "transfer" is by statute not a complete "transfer," nor, perhaps, a "transfer" at all until recording—until delivery to the public recorder. Then, and not until then, has the debtor signified to outside parties, to all others who might become interested in his assets, the effectual separation of the liened property from the rest of his assets. This, it must be conceded, is the bottom principle upon which the recording statutes rest. It is also the bottom principle of the right to legislate against secret liens. Thus, in our preference statute, the great object should be to make clear that the "transfer," so far as outside parties becoming interested in the estate are concerned, is not complete or, perhaps, is not even to be considered a "transfer" at all until delivery of the instrument to the recorder for registration.

We have seen that, despite the amendment of 1903, the supreme courts of some of the States are still holding, in effect, that liens withheld from record (for years maybe) may not be preferences in bankruptcy, even if they are not recorded until within a few days before bankruptcy; so that all that a careful creditor need do is to take a chattel mortgage at the time he begins business with the debtor, keep it off the records as long as he wants to (provided he does not do so by "agreement" with the debtor), and then slam it on, one or two years afterwards, on the eve of bankruptcy. Creditors, then, by these state supreme court decisions must be able to prove that at the time of the "transfer," perhaps several years beforehand, the debtor was then insolvent, the debt was then a past, a preexisting, debt, etc.—a practical impossibility, indeed, an unreasonable requirement, since it is the present insolvent fund of the debtor that is rightly involved and not some ancient fund existing years beforehand.

This proposed amendment squarely and clearly makes the date of the recording (where recording is required under state law to make the lien valid as against levying creditors) the date at which the creditor is to prove the existence of all the elements of a preference—truly the right date, for, as above noted, it is the present insolvent fund with which creditors are concerned, not the debtor's estate in the condition which might have existed two or three years beforehand.

This amendment, viewed in the light of the previous discussion, would seem to speak for itself. It brings forward to the date of the recording the proof of the insolvency and of all the other operative facts of the preference, and makes the section conform to the real and actual intentions of the framers of the amendment of 1903.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 67, SUBDIVISION D.

PRESENT LAW.	PROPOSED AMENDMENT.*
Liens given or accepted in good faith and not in contemplation of or in fraud upon this act, and for a present consideration, which have been recorded according to law, if record thereof was necessary in order to impart notice, shall not be affected by this act.	Liens given or accepted in good faith and not in contemplation of or in fraud upon this act, and for a present consideration, which have been recorded according to law, if record thereof was necessary in order to impart notice, shall, to the extent of such present consideration only, not be affected by this act.

NOTE.—This change is intended to meet the doctrine of such cases as Coder v. Arts (152 Fed., 941), and First National Bank v. Holt (155 Fed., 100). If such decisions are the law, a creditor holding a claim of $1,000 can, on the day before the bankruptcy, loan his debtor an additional $100, taking from him collateral worth, say, $1,500, applicable to both debts, and thus secure a preference so far as the antecedent debt is concerned. This is contrary to the principles back of the statute, and, if permitted to remain the law, would make it easy for banks and merchandise creditors to secure preferences that would, in effect, nullify the law.

THE TIME WHEN THIS LAW SHALL GO INTO EFFECT.

That the provisions of this amendatory act shall not apply to bankruptcy cases pending when this act takes effect, but such cases shall be adjudicated and disposed of conformably to the provisions of said act approved July first, eighteen hundred and ninety-eight, as amended by said act approved February fifth, nineteen hundred and three and as further amended by said act approved June fifteenth, nineteen hundred and six.

NOTE.—This merely indicates the cases which the act shall affect, and is almost identical with section 19 of the amendatory act of 1903.

During the discussion in the House the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] read various statistics from the report of the Attorney-General for the year 1909, relative to the cost of administration of cases in bankruptcy in the States of Georgia and Kentucky. An examination of these figures, which are accurately taken from the report of the Attorney-General, show them to be totally misleading.

In illustration of this it is sufficient to call attention to the following figures read by the gentleman as touching involuntary cases in the northern district of Georgia, where they show total assets realized of $251,714.31, whereas the dividends are given as $371,246.89, being over $120,000 in excess of the total assets realized. It is manifest, of course, that dividends could not exceed total assets, but not only are the figures erroneous in this particular, but they give a totally erroneous impression in not showing the assets that were distributed to lien and other secured criditors and in not showing exemptions, and also in mingling the statistics of cases where there were no assets with cases where there were assets. I subjoin herewith a letter from the Acting Attorney-General of the United States, which serves to show how unreliable the statistics given in the reports are:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 28, 1910.

Hon. SWAGAR SHERLEY,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I wish to acknowledge receipt of your communication of the 26th instant regarding the bankruptcy statistics at present furnished this department, and in reply to advise you as follows:

These statistics do not show separately how much of the actual assets realized were paid out to mortgagees and other lien holders, as distinct from payments to general creditors by way of dividends, nor do these statistics show how much of the commissions and other expenses were commissions paid on the money used in liquidating mortgages and other liens, nor how much of the total expenses was incurred in selling the mortgaged property to realize on the equity, all of which commissions and expenses should rightly be charged against the mortgaged fund.

As an illustration, in an estate realizing in gross, say, $50,000, perhaps $45,000 would be paid to lien holders and only $5,000 declared as dividends, yet the commissions would be figured on the $45,000 paid to lien holders, in addition to the $5,000 paid as dividends to general creditors, making an apparent, but not real, high percentage of commissions in proportion to the dividends paid to the general creditors.

It will also be noted that in more than one-third of the cases of voluntary bankruptcy, and in a few of the involuntary cases, there were no assets whatever, yet the statistics furnished this office at the present time do not separate the costs and expenses of such "no-asset" cases from those where assets exist, thus making the percentage of expenses to dividends appear much greater than it actually is.

In this connection it might be added that the bankruptcy forms at present in use will be revised for the fiscal year 1910–11, so as to show, as far as practicable, approximately the total distribution of all bankrupts' assets.

Respectfully,

J. A. FOWLER,
Acting Attorney-General.

An accurate statement of the expenses of bankruptcy administration will show it to be less expensive than under the old insolvency laws of the States.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, after the words "and six," in line 8, add the following new section:

"SEC. 14. That the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved July 1, 1898, and all acts amendatory thereof, including the act approved February 15, 1903, and the act approved June 15, 1906, and this act, are hereby repealed, but this repeal shall not be operative until the expiration of two years from the date of the approval of this act."

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to trespass upon the time of the House, but I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 90, nays 166, answered "present" 12, not voting 119, as follows:

LAND FOR EXTENSION OF STREETS.

The Speaker laid before the House the following communication from the Senate, which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 4617) to acquire land in the vicinity of the Connecticut Avenue Bridge for the extension of certain streets.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5252. An act to authorize the closing of a part of Forty-first street NW., in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 3254. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poisons in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 7, 1906, by prohibiting the sale of poisonous hair dressing—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. J. Res. 38. Joint resolution fixing the terms of court in the Philippine Islands—to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

THE "THIRD-DEGREE" ORDEAL.

Mr. HEYBURN. I introduce a resolution, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I ask that the Secretary may read the accompanying paper.

The resolution (S. Res. 186) was read, as follows:

Senate resolution 186.

Resolved, That a select committee of three members of the Senate be appointed to inquire and report to the Senate the facts upon the practice of administering of what is known as the "third-degree" ordeal by officers of the law for the purpose of extorting from those charged with crime statements and confessions. Said committee shall have power to send for papers and persons, to subpœna witnesses, and administer oaths. The expenses of said committee to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the accompanying paper, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Wednesday, February 23, 1910.]

SEYLER'S "THIRD-DEGREE" ORDEAL.

French methods of fastening a crime on a person accused, as sharply brought out in the Steinheil case at Paris recently, aroused in America a feeling akin to horror. Yet, cruel and merciless as they were, we ourselves have in the "third degree" a police method of extorting confessions from persons charged with crime which goes beyond the French ordeal both in inception and operation. Carried on behind closed doors, the accused denied benefit of counsel, and nobody present other than the inquisitors and their prey, the "third degree" lends itself to practices not present or possible in open-court proceedings, as in France.

A striking illustration of the devilish process of forcing a confession by mental torture comes to hand from Atlantic City, where Jane Adams came to her death on a pier one night early in the month. Arrested in Virginia on suspicion, William Seyler and his brother, Arvis, were separated and subjected to the "third degree" by their captors. Arvis quickly weakened and made admissions that were used to wring a confession from his more stubborn brother. Beset day and night for a week by relentless inquisitors, who worked in relays, Seyler eventually broke down and made, the police say, a clean breast of the story.

"We had given up hope of coercing him into making a confession," naïvely remarks Chief of Police Woodruff, "when he blurted out his confession. We made no promises, but Seyler trembled in his chair, and declared that his conscience troubled him." Meantime, the inquest had been postponed from time to time, while the "tortures of the damned"—mental tortures no less effective than the rack and thumbscrew—were assiduously employed to "coerce" Seyler.

Now, what authority in law is there for this Americanized form of the French code? Why is not the accused at once brought into court and provided with counsel, as the sense of justice prompts? The Seyler case suggests that if the police choose, a man could be held incommunicado indefinitely, as is done in Mexico, while they continued the "process of coercion," to the end that either the prisoner or his tormenters were forced to give up. The "third degree" has been denounced by the courts time and again, and juries have refused to convict on the strength of confessions thus obtained, but the practice is permitted to go on unchecked.

It is suggested that the International Association of Police Chiefs, which was organized for the betterment of the police service in this country and Canada, could put an end to this abuse of authority by discountenancing the practice formally, and severally seeing to its discontinuance in their respective jurisdictions.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment until I explain the purpose of introducing the resolution at this time.

It has been recently and frequently stated that persons charged with offenses against the law are subjected to a more cruel and barbarous treatment than that known in the days of the inquisition. Only recently I saw a statement in a paper where, when the court called attention to a charge to be investigated, the officers requested further time on the ground that they desired to submit the party charged to further inquisition under what they termed the "third degree." The practice is barbarous. It is in direct conflict with the system of our Government, which, strictly administered, prevents an officer from even conversing with a prisoner in regard to the offense for which he is arrested.

No one with a proper sense of the duty of administering the law would object to any reasonable and proper method of obtaining testimony for the purpose of substantiating a charge, but only a brutal custom, such as can not be recognized in this country, would allow the officers arresting a man to try him, without the benefit of counsel, in secrecy and behind closed doors, prior to his trial in court. It certainly revolts the senses of any American citizen to think that a prisoner, helpless or otherwise, should be first tried in secret in order that weapons may be obtained to oppress him at his trial.

For that reason I have introduced the resolution, and I ask that it go to the Committee on the Judiciary for a speedy report, in order that the Senate may take proper action in the matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION.

Mr. BORAH. I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD an article on irrigation by Ern G. Eagleson, a noted western engineer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MONEY. I should like to inquire the title of the article that it is asked be printed in the RECORD without reading. What is the subject of the communication or excerpt, or whatever it may be?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. "Irrigation" is the heading of the article.

Mr. MONEY. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IRRIGATION.

[By Ern G. Eagleson, at state meeting of engineers and surveyors.]

Irrigation, in its broadest sense, embraces all the problems of hydraulics, and especially those relating to water power and municipal works; and, although in a different sense, it also embraces all problems of conservation of soil and forest, and the reclamation of lands that have too much water. The principal thoughts, however, to which I wish to call your attention at this time are those relating to the irrigation of desert lands and the supply of water for the towns, the importance of the work to the race in the past, its prominence to-day, and the future possibilities in our own Idaho at least.

Irrigation began on the Zerapshan River in Central Asia and was perhaps the first of all the peaceful arts to be practiced by the human race. The oldest records of the ancient civilizations of Asia, Africa, southern Europe, and America show that the first agricultural and communal efforts along the lines of self-support occurred in connection with it; and in those sections least ravaged by war it has been followed continuously ever since.

All the ancient methods of handling water, however, either for irrigation or domestic purposes, were necessarily very expensive in the amount of labor required for their construction and use. The earliest irrigation and municipal water works were built of earth and on the surface of the ground, rendering very much the same service as the small earthen ditches do now. The later water systems of Grecian cities, however, were of a much higher class of structure. They consisted principally of tunnels, supplemented by underground conduits of masonry, so constructed for the better holding of water, and no doubt also as a war precaution. A few of these are still in use, though many thousand years old.

The Roman acqueducts mark a distinct advance in the manner of handling water over that of the Grecian cities, and were undoubtedly the greatest engineering feats of the ancients. Some of the systems were run on a very close grade from the point of supply to the point of use, crossing valleys on stone bridges or viaducts, as high perhaps as any other structures of the time. Three of these acqueducts, I am informed, have been in continuous use since their construction about two thousand years ago.

Although small and crude in a modern sense, these few ancient water systems, built by slaves and captives, are the only structures that have withstood the contests of time and have served the purpose for which they were built continuously through the generations of succeeding races occupying those cities until now. And so it may, and very likely will be, with the great engineering feats of to-day, when the centuries shall have rolled as far ahead of us as they have left behind the Romans, Greeks, Hindoos, Egyptians, and the Mound Builders of our own continent.

Of all the structures in existence in Idaho to-day how few will be left in one hundred years, and how very few will stand in one thousand years, and how unlikely that in two thousand or three thousand years and will be serving the purpose for which they were built, except perhaps a few masonry structures in connection with our irrigation systems. Hence it is that the irrigation engineers of this age are more closely connected with the future races of humanity than any other profession or kind of men. If the structures are rightly located and correctly built, then, indeed, will the future races recount the story of the work, even though the name of the designer and the race to which he belonged shall have been forgotten.

In the great development of the human race, beginning with the Christian era, progress was made in every art save that of irrigation. War, pestilence, slavery, and serfdom had held high carnival in the irrigation world until about sixty years ago, when the bonds of its workers were finally dissolved. The irrigated area, for untold ages the seat of world power, had shrunk to unimportant provinces, generally of other races. Mesopotamia, once the garden spot of civilization, had become almost a barren waste, and so it was in almost every other portion of the irrigated earth, only perhaps in less degree. With the ending of enforced servitude, the crude devices and methods of bygone ages were quickly supplanted by new hydraulic inventions. Southern Europe soon blossomed as a rose and all possible extensions to the irrigated area were soon worked out.

At this time England reorganized India and a little later Egypt. She has built and is still building some tremendous irrigation works in those countries that will last so long as any useful thing can last erected by the hand of man. The Assuan dam, storing and regulating the flow of the Nile, is one of the great engineering feats of our age. In both India and Egypt there are to-day greater areas in cultivation that are providing a better living for a larger population per acre than ever before.

In the Western Hemisphere the early irrigation and municipal water systems were constructed by those mythical and wondrous races whose origin is unknown in history, yet whose water systems in South America, Mexico, and the United States were equal to those of the Romans when the Spaniard found the New World. Most of these great systems fell into ruin through the same causes that brought desolation to the sunny lands of the Eastern Hemisphere.

Commencing with the revival of irrigation greater progress has been made in the art of handling water than during all the thousands of years before. The inventions of power pumping and boring machinery, good hydraulic cement, iron pipe, cut-off gates, and many other devices have made wonderful changes in the hydraulic theories of the ancients. They have totally eliminated the water crock and the old oaken bucket from municipal life, as well as the dipper and treadmill from irrigation works. While these inventions permit of more efficient water systems, the materials used are prone to speedy destruction from wear and rust, and will seldom last longer than a generation of time. But the greater efficiency attained more than justifies their use.

The first Europeans to practice irrigation in the United States were the Spaniards. The Mormons, however, were the first to commence irrigation in the intermountain country, and were, perhaps, the first of the Anglo-Saxon race to practice it anywhere.

At the present time there are about 100,000,000 acres of land irrigated in the world, and about 16 per cent of that amount is in the United States. It is estimated that about 60,000,000 acres can be reclaimed in the United States at moderate cost. However, increased population, higher land values, cheaper materials, higher duties of water, and more efficient devices will undoubtedly increase this amount in a few years to at least 75,000,000 acres, and possibly to 100,000,000 acres.

The 16 States and Territories named in the United States reclamation act contain about 52 per cent of the total area of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, and contain about the same population as the cities of New York and Chicago. Of fruit, wheat, and barley this population raises more than 50 per cent of all produced in the United States. Of other grains and forage it produces an average of less than 25 per cent. When the full acreage of the deserts shall have been reclaimed, it is probable that the percentage of all products will be more nearly the percentage of area than it is now.

Of all the arid States and Territories, Idaho will probably reclaim more acres by irrigation than any other. It is estimated that about 6,500,000 acres can be reclaimed in the State, which is about 11 per cent of all the irrigable lands in the United States of moderate cost. About 5,000,000 acres of Idaho land lie in the Snake River Basin above the Huntington Canyon and now support nearly 200,000 population. Egypt irrigates practically the same area and supports upon it 7,000,000 people, an average of 900 to the square mile. In irrigated Italy the population averages 800 to the square mile, while in India as many as 1,200 subsist on the products of 640 acres. All these countries are poorly supplied with timber, fuel, mineral, forage, and water power, while Idaho has more than its share of these natural resources in and adjoining its irrigated areas. But counting for Idaho a family of four to each 10-acre tract, her irrigated area will have a population of more than 2,500,000 inside of thirty years. All this seems more than probable if the rapid manner in which Idaho lands are being appropriated is any indication of a great movement of population.

During the year 1909 there were 733,278 acres of Carey Act land segregated, and during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, there were appropriated under the various United States laws, by 8,471 applications, 1,383,444 acres, which may include Carey applications. In either case, if we count four to the application, we find a population of about 34,000 moving upon new lands. Towns and other lands have certainly received a like increase, giving a new population equal in number to that of either army at Waterloo.

Since the granting of the first Carey Act segregation about ten years ago, there have been appropriated under this law 2,478,856 acres, the reclamation of which is estimated to cost $67,750,000. Private enterprises are reclaiming 139,000 acres at an estimated cost of $2,780,000. Eleven irrigation districts are improving and extending their systems to embrace 346,000 acres, a large part of which was desert, at an estimated cost of $1,730,000, making a grand total of $72,260,000 being expended under authority of the State.

The withdrawals under the United States reclamation act for the Minidoka and Payette-Boise projects amount to 480,000 acres, the reclamation of which is estimated to cost something over $13,000,000. Perhaps 20 per cent of all this work in the State has been completed, and the total expenditure on all irrigation projects of the State amounts to about $30,000,000.

In October, 1909, there were power filings on the books of the Idaho state engineer to the amount of 312,000 second-feet, estimated to produce about 750,000 horsepower. When Idaho power is fully developed and the flood-water energy is stored, the State will have enough power to meet all requirements of transportation, manufacturing, mining, heating, and lighting that her large population at that time may require.

Idaho is to-day looked upon as the model State in the matter of handling its resources. It has the best irrigation laws yet devised, giving absolute security to both the home builder and the capitalist. Not a bond or water contract has ever failed to be paid and no home has ever been lost on an Idaho project through any unfair exaction of the capitalist or failure of the law. Capital is invited to come here and its stay is so protected that it deals fairly and satisfactorily with the people.

There are capitalists and capitalists; but such men as Buhl, Kuhn, White, Trobridge, Nivers, Hurtt, Clinton, Hammett, and a host of others are the kind that the irrigator and the home builder are glad to know. The areas made possible of reclamation by each of these men are greater than many of the provinces or principalities of the Old World.

Too much praise can not be given our present and past state officers who have performed their duties so conscientiously and satisfactorily to all concerned in these great and important matters.

To the Federal Government, however, must be given the credit of initiating the present general interest in irrigation throughout the United States. This is particularly true of Idaho, where the reclamation projects have had much to contend with that does not fall to the lot of the private enterprise; moreover, and this should always be kept in mind, the Reclamation Service is not expected to take up the reclamation of inexpensive projects which the people or private capital are able and willing to undertake. If Congress would enact the proper remedial legislation, there would be very little criticism of these important government projects.

In this great and glorious work it is our privilege as engineers to have a part, though humble, perhaps, it is one full of the inspiration of creation. The repairers and remodelers are of later times. But we must lay our plans well and work on right lines, then the future races will say, "Well done;" and in their song and story will tell of the people who created a beautiful and fruitful land from the desert and sunshine and waterfall.

INCREASED COST OF LIVING.

Mr. BRADLEY. I desire, by unanimous consent, to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the committee on the investigation of the present high prices an article containing very much useful information from the Louisville Post of February 9.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee to Investigate the Increased Cost of Living and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUTCHER SAYS HE SELLS MEAT AT LOW PRICES BY AVOIDING MIDDLE PROFITS—PROPRIETOR OF THE SHOAT PORK HOUSE BUYS HIS CATTLE AT THE STOCK YARD, BUTCHERS THEM, AND SELLS THE MEAT TO THE CONSUMER—DEALS ON SMALL MARGIN, BUT DOES BIG BUSINESS.

		Cents.
Pork chops	per pound	10
Pork roast	do	10
Beefsteak	do	10
Beef roast	do	8–10
Soup meat	do	7
Fresh sausage	do	10
Hog livers	each	5
Spare ribs	per pound	10
Pigfeet	per dozen	20
Kidneys	per half dozen	5

These are not the prices we used to pay for meat in "the good old days." They are the prices asked by William Smith Gregory, proprietor of the Shoat Pork House, at Preston and Lynn streets, whose rigid economy, together with the absence of all "new-fangled luxuries," and the knack of using everything and wasting nothing, has enabled him to make a fair profit with prices that to other butchers seem nothing less than certain loss. Mr. Gregory has been a butcher all his life, and, as he says, he knows everything about cattle, from their horns to their hoofs.

The Shoat Pork House, which has attracted considerable attention on account of its extreme low prices in these "meat-boycott" days, is now in its second year. It was started by Mr. Gregory last winter and did a fair business. But the trade has increased so much during the present season that the place is four times as large as the original building and has a separate slaughterhouse, which is larger than the "sales department" with all its additions. In place of the one boy, who acted as assistant to the proprietor last year, there are now 10 men, not counting Mr. Gregory's wife, who acts as cashier.

When asked how he can afford to sell at such prices, Mr. Gregory gave the following reasons:

He does not have the expense of telephones, gas, or electricity, or other "newfangled" luxuries.

He has no horse or wagon.

His rent is very low, compared with other butchers.

BUYS FROM STOCK YARD.

The most important item, however, is the way in which he buys his stock. Mr. Gregory goes direct to the stock yards and buys direct from the cattle raisers. In this way he cuts out the profits of the commission men, the packers, and, in some cases, the wholesale dealers. In going to his customers the meat is handled only by the stock yards and himself, but the ordinary consumer gets his meat only after it is handled by the stock yards, the commission men, the butchers, the packers, and sometimes the wholesale grocers. So in this way Mr. Grogery cuts out the profits of two or three middlemen, and consequently can sell his meat at a comparatively low price.

Mr. Gregory refused to tell what price he paid for his live cattle, but it was learned that it was nearly 5½ cents per pound. For a steer weighing 1,000 pounds he pays $55. This same animal when dressed weighs not over 600 pounds, for which Mr. Gregory receives 10 cents a pound, coming out a little ahead on the deal. More profit comes from the hide, which weighs about 40 pounds, and for which he receives 12 cents a pound, or $4.80. The head and hoofs bring 15 cents a set and the bones bring one-half cent a pound, or about 10 cents from an average steer.

SAYS THE PACKERS INCREASE THE PRICES.

Gregory said that the prices he paid for the steers were even higher than those paid by Armour, Cudahy, Swift, and other big packers, who receive low prices on account of the great amount they buy. In spite of the low prices they pay, these firms advance the prices and the greater part of the profit goes to them.

"They are entirely responsible for the present high prices," concluded Mr. Gregory.

The Shoat Pork House disposes of an enormous amount of meat in a week. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Gregory went to the stock yards and only secured 45 hogs, as porkers were rather scarce. He says that these 45 will be sold before Friday. In an average week's business the following animals were disposed of: Thirty-five cattle, 120 hogs, 10 calves, 10 sheep.

All this meat is inspected by the government inspectors, the same as the stock of the other butchers and packers, and, according to Mr. Gregory, it is just as good as theirs. He says that the people from whom he makes his purchases sell to the commission men, who dispose of the same to other middlemen, and in the course of time it reaches the consumer, but at a considerably advanced price.

RUSH OF BUSINESS ALWAYS.

The Shoat Pork House is busy all the time. The men go on duty at 7 o'clock in the morning and sometimes have to remain as late as 10 or 11 o'clock. Five men in the slaughterhouse start at 7 o'clock and keep busy during the day doing nothing but killing and dressing the animals. These men are experts in their line and one, according to Mr. Gregory, consumed only six minutes in transforming a live hog into pork chops and other choice cuts. "And the next minute," said Mr. Gregory, "the porker went out the front door in the baskets of several customers."

There are four meat cutters, whose sole duty it is to wait upon the customers. Mr. Gregory attends to the financial end of the establishment, except when an unusual rush is on, when he also cuts the meat and leaves his wife in charge of the finance department. The tenth man is the sausage maker.

Last year the Shoat Pork House closed its doors in June, but this season it will run the year through. Mr. Gregory has placed an order for a huge refrigerator and when the summer's heat comes he will be found at the same old stand ready for business with meat at 10 cents a pound. As the motto on Mr. Gregory's card reads:

"I'd rather close my door
Than charge you more."

GOVERNMENT OF HAWAII.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico are very anxious to have the bill (S. 3360) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900, taken up. It is an important measure relating to the organic law of Hawaii.

Mr. KEAN. The bill is on the calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is on the calendar under Rule IX. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for its present consideration. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. DEPEW. The bill has been read.

Mr. KEAN. Let it be again read.

Mr. BACON. It will have to be read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the Constitution, and, except as otherwise provided, all the laws of the United States, including laws carrying general appropriations, which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory as elsewhere in the United States: Provided, That sections 1841 to 1891, inclusive, 1910, and 1912, of the Revised Statutes, and the amendments thereto, and an act entitled 'An act to prohibit the passage of local or special laws in the Territories of the United States, to limit territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes,' approved July 30, 1886, and the amendments thereto, shall not apply to Hawaii."

SEC. 2. That section 26 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 26. That the members of the legislature shall receive for their services, in addition to mileage at the rate of 10 cents a mile each way, the sum of $1,000 for each regular session, payable in three equal installments on and after the first, thirtieth, and fiftieth days of the session, and the sum of $200 for each special session: Provided, That they shall receive no compensation for any extra session held under the provisions of section 54 of this act."

SEC. 3. That section 52 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 52. That appropriations, except as herein otherwise provided, shall be made by the legislature."

SEC. 4. That section 55 of said act is hereby amended so that the part thereof relating to public indebtedness and beginning with the words "nor shall any debt" shall read as follows: "Nor shall any debt be authorized to be contracted by or on behalf of the Territory, or any political or municipal corporation or subdivision thereof, except to pay the interest upon the existing indebtedness, to suppress insurrection, or to provide for the common defense, except that in addition to any indebtedness created for such purposes the legislature may authorize loans by the Territory, or any such subdivision thereof, for the erection of penal, charitable, and educational institutions, and for public buildings, wharves, roads, harbor, and other public improvements, and for the development of natural resources and public lands, but the total of such indebtedness incurred in any one year by the Territory or any such subdivision shall not exceed 1 per cent of the assessed value of the property in the Territory or subdivision, respectively, as shown by the then last assessments for taxation, whether such assessments are made by the Territory or the subdivision or subdivisions, and the total indebtedness of the Territory shall not at any time be extended beyond 7 per cent of such assessed value of property in the Territory and the total indebtedness of any such subdivision shall not at any time be extended beyond 3 per cent of such assessed value of property in the subdivision, but nothing in this act shall prevent the refunding of any indebtedness at any time; nor shall any such loan be made upon the credit of the public domain or any part thereof; nor shall any bond or other instrument of any such indebtedness be issued unless made payable in not more than thirty years from the date of the issue thereof; nor shall any such bond or indebtedness be issued or incurred until approved by the President of the United States: Provided, That, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, the legislature of the Territory may provide for loans of public moneys, or guaranties of private loans, on proper security to settlers on the public lands for necessary permanent improvements of their homesteads, and for loans, subsidies, or guaranties to persons or corporations for the improvement and increase of transportation facilities."

SEC. 5. That section 73 of said act is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

"No person shall hereafter be entitled to receive any certificate of occupation, right of purchase lease, cash freehold agreement, or special homestead agreement who or whose husband or wife shall previously have taken or held any land under any such certificate, lease, or agreement hereafter made or issued, or under any homestead lease or patent based thereon; or who or whose husband or wife, or both of them, shall then own other land in the Territory, the combined area of which and the land in question exceeds 80 acres; or who is an alien, unless he has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States as provided by law; nor shall any person who, having so declared his intention, shall hereafter take or hold under any such certificate, lease, or agreement, continue so to hold or become entitled to a homestead lease or patent of the land, unless he shall have become a citizen within five years after so taking.

"No land for which any such certificate, lease, or agreement shall hereafter be issued, or any part thereof or interest therein or control thereof, shall, without the written consent of the commissioner and governor, thereafter, whether before or after a homestead lease or patent has been issued thereon, be or be contracted to be in any way, directly or indirectly, by process of law or otherwise, conveyed, mortgaged, leased, or otherwise transferred to or acquired or held by or for the benefit of any alien or corporation; or, before or after the issuance of a homestead lease or before the issuance of a patent, to or by or for the benefit of any other person; or, after the issuance of a patent, to or by or for the benefit of any person who owns, holds, or controls, directly or indirectly, other land or the use thereof the combined area of which and the land in question exceeds 80 acres: Provided, That these prohibitions shall not apply to transfers or acquisitions by inheritance or between tenants in common.

"Any land in respect of which any of the foregoing provisions shall be violated shall forthwith be forfeited and resume the status of public land and may be recovered by the Territory or its successors in an action of ejectment or other appropriate proceeding. And noncompliance with the terms of any such certificate, lease, or agreement, or of the law applicable thereto, shall entitle the commissioner, with the approval of the governor, with or without legal process, notice, demand, or previous entry, to retake possession and thereby determine the estate: Provided, That the times limited for compliance with any such terms may be extended by the commissioner, with such approval, upon its appearing that an effort has been made in good faith to comply therewith.

"The persons entitled to take under any such certificate, lease, or agreement shall be determined by drawing or lot, after public notice as hereinafter provided; and any lot not taken, or taken and forfeited, or any lot or part thereof surrendered with the consent of the commissioner, which is hereby authorized, may be disposed of upon application at not less than the advertised price by any such certificate, lease, or agreement without further notice. The notice of any sale, drawing, or allotment of public land shall be by publication for a period of not less than sixty days in one or more newspapers of general circulation published in the Territory.

"The commissioner, with the approval of the governor, may give to any person who has, or who and whose predecessors in interest have, improved any parcel of public land and resided thereon not less than five years immediately preceding the date of application a preference right to purchase so much of such parcel and such adjoining land as may reasonably be required for a home, at a fair price to be determined by three disinterested persons appointed by the governor, in the determination of which price the value of improvements shall, when deemed just and reasonable, be disregarded.

"The commissioner may also, with such approval, issue, for a nominal consideration, to any church or religious organization, or person or persons or corporation representing it, a patent for any parcel of public land occupied continuously for not less than five years heretofore and still occupied by it as a church site under the laws of Hawaii.

"No sale for other than homestead purposes and no exchange by which the Territory shall convey land exceeding either 40 acres in area or $5,000 in value, and no lease of agricultural land exceeding 40 acres in area, shall be made without the approval of two-thirds of a board appointed as provided in section 80 of this act, and until the legislature otherwise provides said board shall consist of six members and its members be appointed for terms of four years.

"All lands in the possession, use, and control of the Territory shall hereafter be managed by the commissioner, except such as shall be set aside for public purposes as hereinafter provided; all sales and other dispositions of such land shall be made by the commissioner or under his direction, for which purpose, if necessary, the land may be transferred to his department from any other department by direction of the governor, and all patents and deeds of such land shall issue from the office of the commissioner, who shall countersign the same and keep a record thereof. Lands conveyed to the Territory in exchange for other lands that are subject to the land laws of Hawaii, as amended by this act, shall, except as otherwise provided, have the same status and be subject to such laws as if they had previously been public lands of Hawaii. All orders setting aside lands for forest or other public purposes, or withdrawing the same, shall be made by the governor, and lands while so set aside for such purposes may be managed as may be provided by the laws of the Territory. The commissioner is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts, prescribe forms of oaths, and, with the approval of the governor and said board, make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this section and the land laws of Hawaii into full force and effect."

SEC. 6. That section 84 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 84. That no person shall sit as a judge or juror in any case in which his relative by affinity or by consanguinity within the third degree is interested, either as a plaintiff or defendant, or in the issue of which the said judge or juror has, either directly or through such relative, any pecuniary interest; nor shall any person sit as a judge in any case in which he has been of counsel or on an appeal from any decision or judgment rendered by him, and the legislature of the Territory may add other causes of disqualification to those herein enumerated."

SEC. 7. That section 91 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 91. That, except as otherwise provided, the public property ceded and transferred to the United States by the Republic of Hawaii under the joint resolution of annexation, approved July 7, 1898, shall be and remain in the possession, use, and control of the government of the Territory of Hawaii, and shall be maintained, managed, and cared for by it, at its own expense, until otherwise provided for by Congress, or taken for the uses and purposes of the United States by direction of the President or of the governor of Hawaii. And any such public property so taken for the uses and purposes of the United States may be restored to its previous status by direction of the President; and the title to any such public property in the possession and use of the Territory for the purposes of water, sewer, electric, and other public works, penal, charitable, scientific, and educational institutions, cemeteries, hospitals, parks, highways, wharves, landings, harbor improvements, public buildings, or other public purposes, or required for any such purposes may be transferred to the Territory by direction of the President, and the title to any property so transferred to the Territory may thereafter be transferred to any city, county, or other political subdivision thereof by direction of the governor when thereunto authorized by the legislature."

SEC. 8. That section 92 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 92. That the following officers shall receive the following annual salaries to be paid by the United States: The governor, $10,000; the secretary of the Territory, $5,000; the chief justice of the supreme court of the Territory, $6,500; the associate justices of the supreme court, $6,000 each; the judges of the circuit courts, $4,000 each; the United States district attorney, $5,000; the United States marshal, $4,000. And the governor shall receive annually, in addition to his salary, the sum of $1,000 for stationery, postage, and incidentals; also his traveling expenses while absent from the capital on official business, and the sum of $2,000 annually for his private secretary."

SEC. 9. That section 100 of said act is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

"All records relating to naturalization, all declarations of intention to become citizens of the United States, and all certificates of naturalization filed, recorded, or issued prior to the taking effect of the naturalization act of June 29, 1906, in or from any circuit court of the Territory of Hawaii, shall for all purposes be deemed to be and to have been made, filed, recorded, or issued by a court with jurisdiction to naturalize aliens, but shall not be by this act further validated or legalized."

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, when this bill was under consideration a few days since, there were so many questions raised in regard to it that I have concluded to make a general presentation of the whole matter. This seems more necessary because the joint resolution of annexation, which was virtually a compact between the United States Government and the Republic of Hawaii, was passed July 7, 1898, and the organic act providing in detail for the new government under the sovereignty of the United States, became a law April 30, 1900, and on the 30th of April of this year this law will have been in effect ten years. During this period many changes have taken place in the Hawaiian Islands, both in their population, their commercial relations, and their industries, but the organic act has not been amended in any essential particular during this time. In fact, I think only few amendments have been passed, and those related to the Delegate and increasing the power of the territorial legislature. The bill under consideration has been unanimously recommended by both houses of the Hawaiian legislature, is strongly advocated by the governor, and is also approved by the Secretary of the Interior. It has also the approval of the commercial and political organizations and the public press of Hawaii.

Before entering upon a detail of the changes which are proposed to the organic law by this bill, it may be well to recall briefly the story of Hawaii and our relations to the islands. The islands have enjoyed a government of laws for over a hundred years. They were ruled by a king, who was an absolute autocrat for about fifty years, and then by a king and congress of two houses until the revolution, which established a republic in 1894, and then as a republic with a president and two houses of congress, modeled on the American system, until the annexation in 1900.

The political history of the islands is not different in the development of government from the experiences of European nations. Among the petty kings there appeared in 1790 one of those geniuses who arise among all primitive peoples called Kamehameha. He conquered the islands, overthrew all the petty kings, and concentrated supreme authority in himself. Though he had no rules for guidance and knew no history, nevertheless he established a feudal government like that which existed in France during the middle ages.

In 1820 the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions sent seven married men with their wives to Honolulu. The coming of these men and their families was the turning point in the political and religious history of Hawaii and its social conditions. In ten years they and other brethren who came afterwards converted the entire population to Christianity. Hawaii to-day with its high civilization, its very small percentage of illiteracy, smaller than in any State or Territory, its free government, its peaceful and orderly subjection to law, its intelligent exercise of all the powers of government through an elective legislature, its common-school system, and its commercial and industrial progress is a monument to the work, devotion, and genius of the missionary spirit. If the missions needed any defense, the Hawaiian archipelago, separated from the world by thousands of miles of ocean, and owing its changed conditions from savagery to civilization entirely to the efforts of the missionaries, is a permanent and magnificent exhibit of their spiritual and temporal blessings. The sovereign and the nobles, after ten years of Christian teaching, devolved upon the people self-government and divided their authority with a legislature consisting of two houses. These early converts, in a rude effort to conform to the teachings of their spiritual intructors, adopted as their first constitution and bill of rights the Ten Commandments.

Except for the efforts of succeeding sovereigns to regain autocratic power, which ultimately led to the overthrow of a monarchy and the establishment of a republic, the islands were wisely, intelligently, and conservatively governed. All the great nations of the world saw the value of the Hawaiian Islands and endeavored to secure exclusive privileges through the favor of its sovereign. The British carried the King and Queen, as far back as about 1826, to Great Britain as the guests of the nation. King Kalakaua was received by all the governments of the world, including our own. From San Francisco to New York his journey was a sort of triumphal march in the reception which he received from commercial bodies, who saw great advantages in securing for the United States the commerce of Hawaii.

An incident in this trip was one of those rare contributions to the sedate movement of history, which promotes good fellowship by adding to the gayety of nations. Chicago received the King with impressive ceremonies on his arrival. After a weary day of parades and reviews, the then mayor of the metropolis of the West found a King on his hands. He wished, of course, to promote the commercial interests of the city over which he presided. At the same time kings were not in his line, nor was he familiar with their attributes or customs of court or the methods of addressing them. To relieve himself of embarrassment he drove His Majesty to the leading hotel and, leaving him in the lobby, said, "Good afternoon, King. We have had a hard day, and I think you had better go to your room and wash up." [Laughter.] I was in London at the time of the jubilee of Queen Victoria. Every nation was specially represented, and the royalties who came were received with the consideration due them on such occasions. Among them was the Queen of the Sandwich Islands. She demanded the fullest recognition of her rank as the equal of the rulers of the great kingdoms of the earth. No better testimony could be given of the feeling in the British Foreign Office of the value of the Hawaiian Islands to Great Britain than the fact that the Queen was accorded everything she asked—her place in the procession, an escort of the guards, and a guest at Windsor. There was current a story at the time that at the dinner the Hawaiian Queen said to Queen Victoria, "Your Majesty, I am a blood relative." To the astonished inquiry, "How so?" the Hawaiian Queen answered, "My grandfather ate Captain Cook." [Laughter.]

Foreign historians and encyclopedists claim that our Government promoted the revolution in Hawaii for the purpose of annexation, and that the annexation was a violation of an unwritten but friendly understanding between commercial nations of the world—that the independence of Hawaii should be respected. But the Government was so feeble and the population so small that it was impossible for them long to continue their independence. In fact, the islands had been repeatedly seized and Honolulu occupied, and overtures had been made to the United States at different times under the monarchy for a union for the purpose of protection. In 1829, Laplace, commander of a French frigate, seized Honolulu and held it until he had forced upon the Government a treaty. In 1843, Lord Pawlet, commanding a British frigate, seized the islands in the name of Great Britain, but the British Government subsequently released them on the remonstrances of the other powers. The French again seized the islands in 1849 and held them for a considerable time, but finally gave them up because of the opposition of the United States and Great Britain. In 1851, the King, to escape his difficulties with France and England, gave to our representative a deed of cession of the islands to the United States, to be held until an adjustment could be made with these countries, and failing in that, to be held permanently. In 1854 Secretary of State, Mr. Marcy, authorized negotiations for an annexation treaty. The King made a draft of a treaty which was accepted by Mr. Marcy, but before it was ratified the King died. In 1893 a treaty was negotiated between our Government and that of the Hawaiian Islands for the annexation of the islands to the United States. This treaty was withdrawn by the President from the Senate. Again, June 16, 1897, a treaty of annexation, similar in its provisions to the joint resolutions which were adopted in 1898, was agreed to by the Government of Hawaii and duly ratified by their Senate. In 1900 the union was effected by the action of the United States of America. This recapitulation shows that the islands came to us in the natural course of events and not by illegal methods or undue pressure.

A moment's consideration of the geographical position of the islands will demonstrate why there was such universal anxiety either to control or to capture them. Honolulu is 2,100 miles from San Francisco, about 5,000 from Hongkong, and 4,000 from the Philippines. If Great Britain, or Germany, or France, or Japan, had come into their possession, the protection of our Pacific coast would have been almost impossible. But with the islands in our possession, properly fortified and with a naval harbor and equipment, it is practically impossible for any nation to successfully attack or to reach our Pacific coast. No Japanese fleet of warships could come to any of our harbors unless they could coal in Hawaii, nor would it be possible in practical warfare for a Japanese fleet to carry either coal or the colliers, with Hawaii hostile and in our possession, to make a successful attack upon our Pacific coast or to have any hope of ever returning.

The strategic value of the islands is admitted by the military and naval experts of all countries. Pearl Harbor in Hawaii is of incalculable value. It will accommodate our whole navy. It is reached by a long and deep channel which can be easily fortified. On its shores can be built shipyards, coal yards, and all the equipment of a first-class, up-to-date naval station. The possession of the Hawaiian Islands and the utilization of Pearl Harbor give to the United States for war, for peace, and for commerce the command of the Pacific Ocean. There are eight inhabited and several uninhabited islands, extending in single file about 400 miles. Their total area is 6,449 square miles. The islands are of purely volcanic origin and were thrown up out of the sea. They consist of mountains running up to 14,000 feet, with fertile valleys between, in which under their climate are successfully grown sugar, rice, coffee, bananas, pineapples, oranges, limes, lemons, guava, and figs.

At the time of the annexation the population of Hawaii was 154,000. It is now 200,000. The population at that time consisted of 37,635 Hawaiians and part Hawaiians, 61,115 Japanese, 25,762 Chinese, 15,675 Portuguese, 7,283 Americans and Hawaiian born foreigners, 1,730 British, 1,154 Germans, 410 Norwegians, 2,584 other foreigners, and 653 Polynesians. In the relative proportions now the Hawaiians and part Hawaiians remain about the same, others have gained moderately, but the Japanese have increased from 61,000 to about 80,000.

The climate is particularly healthy. The average temperature is 72°, and never below 55° nor higher than 88°. There is never any frost or snow except on the high mountain peaks.

At the time of the annexation the Territory had a common-school system based upon that of the New England States, and 87 per cent of its native population could read and write. It is reported now that all the natives can do so. In 1900, at the time of annexation, there were 15,000 pupils in the public schools, and in 1909 there were 25,000. The industrial education in the public schools includes agricultural work, bamboo work, and other manual training, sewing, knife work, singing, and drawing. The daily average attendance of the pupils was 18,000 in 1909. There were $368,000 spent for school purposes in 1900, and $533,000 in 1909. In addition to their common schools and high schools they have a college of agriculture and mechanic arts, with 12 members in the faculty, all of whom are specialists in their several lines of work, and 102 students in the prescribed courses.

Since annexation the Territory has expended from its own revenues for public buildings, school buildings, waterworks, sewers, bridges, wharves, landings, and dredging $3,400,000.

The customs receipts for the year 1901 were $1,220,000; in 1909, $1,400,000.

The tonnage of the vessels entering and departing from the islands in 1901 was 943,000; in 1909, 1,160,000.

The deposits in the banks for the first year after annexation, 1901, were $4,000,000 in the commercial banks and $1,000,000 in the savings banks; in 1909 the deposits were $6,300,000 in the commercial banks and $3,323,000 in the savings banks, or in 1901, the first year of annexation, the deposits in all the banks were $5,000,000; in 1909, $9,623,000.

There are 175,000 savings-bank depositors.

The taxes collected in 1901 for territorial purposes were $1,216,000; in 1909, $2,080,000.

The assessed value of property in the islands was, in 1901, $110,000,000; in 1909, $139,000,000.

The imports and exports have also largely increased. I think, nearly doubled.

There are in the islands 7 dailies, 12 weeklies and semi-weeklies, 5 monthlies, and 3 quarterlies.

The water problem is the most important one in Hawaii. There is excessive rainfall in certain districts and very little in others, and a greater portion of the land suited to population lies in arid regions. The work of conserving the water and transferring it to arid lands is now receiving a great deal of attention from the territorial government. They have a commissioner for this purpose who also looks after reforestation and propagation. Of the sugar lands, one-half were arid lands and have been reclaimed at a cost of $15,000,000, or about $140 an acre. This reclamation has been done entirely by private enterprise.

Now, as to the government of the islands: There are a governor and a secretary appointed by the President, who hold office four years, both of whom must be citizens of the Territory. There are an attorney-general, a treasurer, commissioner of public lands, commissioner of agriculture and forestry, a superintendent of public works, a superintendent of public instruction, an auditor, a deputy auditor, a surveyor and high sheriff, who are appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the territorial senate. The judiciary of the islands consists of the United States district judge and a territorial judiciary, consisting of a supreme court with a chief justice and two associate justices, and the circuit courts with seven judges. The legislature of Hawaii consists of two houses, the senate and the house of representatives, the members of which are elected by universal suffrage. There are 15 members of the senate and 30 members of the house of representatives. The term of the members of the senate is four years and that of the members of the house of representatives two years.

It is a tribute, and a remarkable one, to the self-governing powers of the Hawaiian people that they should have been granted in the organic act conditions of self-government which have not been given to any other of our possessions or territories, and this is explained in the report of the commission, whose chairman was Senator CULLOM, advising the annexation, in which he said:

> The underlying theory of our Government is the right of self-government, and a people must be fitted for self-government before they can be trusted with the responsibilities and duties attaching to free government.
> These remarks are made to negative the idea that because the people of the Hawaiian Islands can, in the judgment of the commission, be consistently given self-government to an extent almost equal to that given to the people in the States, it can be safely inferred that other insular possessions which the United States have, or may acquire by treaty with Spain, can be granted equal freedom in government.

While the organic act provides for a continuance of executive, legislative, judicial, and administrative duties almost the same as existed under the republic, and the laws of Hawaii relating to the public lands and other subjects were continued in force, and a decade has elapsed since annexation, during which these islands have exercised self-government, there has been no call upon Congress to interfere with or to curb or to repeal any action of the Hawaiian legislature. On the contrary, in one of the very few amendments of the organic act the powers of that legislature have been enlarged.

The purpose of the present bill is to so amend the laws under which Hawaii has been governed for ten years as to meet present conditions. These amendments provide for an increase of the salary of the governor from $5,000 to $10,000 a year, of members of the legislature from $600 to $1,000 a year, of the judges of the supreme court from $5,500 to $6,500 for the chief justice, and from $5,000 to $6,000 for the associate justices, and the circuit judges from $3,000 to $4,000 a year.

The governor in his presentation and argument for the bill said that the expense of living in Hawaii is from 25 per cent to 50 per cent greater than on the mainland; that if the salary of the members of the legislature was made $1,000 a higher class of men could be secured to represent the people; that the salaries of the judges were insufficient, as was demonstrated by the fact that two of them had resigned to return to the practice of the law within the last year.

Another amendment relates to the creation of debts by the Territory and its subdivisions and places restrictions other than have heretofore existed. At the same time it permits five-thirty-year bonds to be issued instead of five-fifteen, because with a thirty-year bond the government indebtedness which is about coming due can be refunded under much better terms. The public debt of the Territory is $3,959,000, of which $1,000,000 is due now and another million becomes due next January, and this amount must be refunded.

The governor and his advisers claim that under the conditions in the islands it is necessary for power to be given for loans of public moneys, or guaranties of private loans, on proper security, to settlers on the public lands for necessary permanent improvements of their homesteads, and for loans, subsidies, or guaranties to persons or corporations for the improvement and increase of transportation facilities.

The last power, I think, ought to be restricted by a provision similar to that which is adopted for the Philippine Islands, which should be as follows:

> Provided, That the provisions of section four, except the last paragraph thereof, of an act approved February sixth, nineteen hundred and five, authorizing a guarantee of interest on railroad bonds in the Philippine Islands, is hereby extended and made applicable to the Territory of Hawaii, with the following changes: "Hawaiian" shall be substituted for "Philippine," "governor" for "governor-general," and "two hundred thousand" for "one million two hundred thousand," in said section as applied to Hawaii.

With this limitation I think that the provision is a wise one. The conditions of settlement upon the public lands in Hawaii differ entirely from those on the mainland or any of our insular possessions. Most of it is arid land, but very productive under irrigation. The cost of raw material is great and transportation difficult, so that the land presents few attractions for the homesteaders unless they can be helped. It is the opinion of the governor that the land developed by the assistance of the Territory will furnish ample security for the loans. The islands are so cut up, because of their volcanic origin, into chasms, abysses, precipitous mountain sides, and fertile valleys that capital has not been willing to invest in the building of railroads. It is the opinion of the governor that if the credit of the Territory can be extended for the construction of these lines that homesteading and development will follow and the lines become self-sustaining and profitable, but that capitalists before making the adventure must be encouraged by having the Government show its confidence in the enterprises. While this privilege, under ordinary circumstances, would be dangerous and against public policy, I think in the case of Hawaii, as in that of the Philippines, it is wise, and with a restriction to the limit of $200,000 no harm could result. It is also provided that the loans of public moneys or guaranties either to the settlers or corporations, before they can be made, must receive the approval of the President of the United States.

We must remember that Hawaii supports its own government and contributes $1,500,000 a year to the National Treasury.

The most important part of this amendment relates to the disposal of the public lands. There remain of these lands about 1,700,000 acres, but only about 15 per cent can be made agricultural and productive; that is, about 250,000 acres. The land laws are those which existed under the republic, and have not been changed since the annexation. The principal object of the present amendment is to correct the abuses which frequently occurred under the present laws and to place restrictions which will prevent the acquisition and exploitation of public lands by capitalists and corporations. Hawaii needs a permanent population of homesteaders. At present public lands can be disposed of by the land commissioner with the consent of the governor. It is proposed now to have a commission appointed by the governor, and their approval shall be necessary for the leasing, exchange, and sale of lands other than for homesteads, and their action shall be by a two-thirds vote and the governor's approval. There has been a great deal of fake homesteading. A capitalist or a corporation desiring to secure an extensive tract would have the farms, which are restricted in some of the islands to 20 acres and in others to 80 acres, taken up one after another and conveyed to himself or to itself. In the proposed bill this is rendered impossible. The owner is prohibited from mortgaging or leasing the land until after he secures his patent, and then not to a corporation, or to an individual already holding more than 80 acres. If a person has already one plot of 80 acres he can not secure another. It is hoped that with a board of commissioners, acting in conjunction with the governor and the land commissioner, this invaluable possession of the territorial government may be so administered as to secure enterprising and energetic homesteaders who will become the permanent citizens of the islands and cultivators of their farms, and also to derive for the government treasury from these lands a large source of revenue.

Mr. President, in considering this bill we must remember how important to us is the continued prosperity of the Hawaiian Islands. We must take into consideration the development and progress which they have made practically under their own government since annexation to the United States. We must bear in mind that to a remarkable degree, in fact, to a degree quite equal to any of our States, the government of the islands has been intelligent and progressive. We must bear in mind that, without burdening their people, they have devised a system of local taxation under which they have spent vast sums on public works, buildings, and education, and that there is a consensus of opinion among those who are best informed that the administration of these funds has been honest and judicious. Under all the conditions, I think they are entitled to this legislation, which has received the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and of every organ of public opinion, official and unofficial, in the territory.

Now, Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment, to come in at the end of section 4.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 4 it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the provisions of section 4, except the last paragraph thereof, of an act approved February 6, 1905, authorizing a guarantee of interest on railroad bonds in the Philippine Islands, is hereby extended and made applicable to the Territory of Hawaii, with the following changes: "Hawaiian" shall be substituted for "Philippine;" "governor" for "governor-general;" and "two hundred thousand" for "one million two hundred thousand," in said section as applied to Hawaii.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, not having the law in relation to the Philippines before us, I ask the Senator from New York, in charge of the bill, if he will give us just the significance of the proposed amendment?

Mr. DEPEW. The significance of the proposed amendment is simply to restrict the amount to be expended. Under the Philippine act the amount which can be paid for the building of railroads is restricted to $1,200,000. Under the act, as it is proposed to extend it to the Hawaiian Islands, it is limited to $200,000.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am opposed to this legislation, so far as it relates to the part of the bill beginning with the proviso in line 6, on page 4. It is not my belief that the Government of the United States ought to authorize any of the Territories to extend the territorial aid to private or corporate enterprises, either by way of loaning them money or guaranteeing their indebtedness. I am exceedingly anxious that this bill shall go through in its main features, because I believe I realize as much as one can, with such observation as I have been able to give it, the necessity of many parts of the bill, but this particular section, I believe, ought not to be enacted into law, and I call the attention of the Senate to the wording of it. It reads:

Provided, That, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, the legislature of the Territory may provide for loans of public moneys, or guaranties of private loans, on proper security, to settlers on the public lands for necessary permanent improvements of their homesteads, and for loans, subsidies, or guaranties to persons or corporations for the improvement and increase of transportation facilities.

Mr. President, I can see a great deal of harm that might come to the people of the Hawaiian Islands by the exercise of that authority if we confer it upon them. I think it is something that is unknown to our legislation in regard to any of our Territories, and I believe it ought not to be entered upon at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. At the time this bill was considered by the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico I was unable to be present, but I was impressed with certain objections which ought to be raised to it and intended to submit them to the committee. Being occupied, however, with duties on another committee, which promises to consume considerable time of its members, I was not able to be present. I take it I am within my rights and observing the fullest courtesy to the members of that committee and its distinguished chairman when I, for the first time, raise objection to this bill here.

There are many features of the bill, it seems to me, which are unwise and which Congress ought not to enact into law. The particular amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] is, I think, an improvement on the pending bill, but I agree with the Senator from Wyoming that it would be better still to eliminate the proviso from that section entirely. I shall offer an amendment to that effect.

While I am up, Mr. President, permit me to make a few other observations regarding the measure. To do so logically we should take up the first section of the bill. The purpose of that section is to change the present law of the Territory by incorporating in it the language "including laws carrying general appropriations." When that is accomplished, the entire purpose of this amendment is accomplished; and therefore it is unnecessary, it seems to me, to add in the proviso to that section the various sections of the Revised Statutes and to declare that they shall have no reference to the Territory of Hawaii. I shall, therefore, offer an amendment, when the time comes and it is appropriate, to the effect that we strike out all after the word "and," in line 12, page 1, and add the words "fifty and eighteen hundred and ninety of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not apply to the Territory of Hawaii."

This would make that section conform to the present law, except only that it puts into the law the language "including laws carrying general appropriations," which it is desirable should be embodied in the law, thus relieving it of certain ambiguities.

The next section, section 2 of the bill, it seems to me, is highly objectionable, in that it provides that the members of the legislature of that Territory shall receive as compensation $1,000 per session. In addition to that they are to receive mileage; and in case of an extra session, they are to receive the further sum of $200.

Mr. President, I submit that this is a long leap in the way of extravagance; that it is a tremendous increase in the expenses of that Territory to provide that the legislator, who is now paid $400 per annum, shall have his compensation advanced to $1,000 per annum.

Mr. DEPEW. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. DEPEW. Under the law as it is now the Hawaiian legislator receives $400 for the regular session and $200 if called in extra session. They are always called in extra session, because they arrange it so that they shall be. This proposes, instead of the $600, that they shall receive $1,000 in full, except their mileage.

Mr. FLETCHER. Exactly; I understand that; and the provision in the present section now proposed, to the effect that they shall have no compensation for services at a special session is a very wise one, and I approve the section in toto, except as to this great increase in the pay of the members of the legislature. They have a house of 30 members, a senate of 15 members. One thousand dollars for each member for the regular session of the legislature means $45,000. Add to that the mileage and add to that other necessary expenses incident to a session of the legislature, and we find it will cost the Territory of Hawaii $75,000 or $80,000 every time the legislature meets.

I submit, Mr. President, that this advance in the pay of the members of the legislature is entirely unwarranted. In most of the States the pay is a per diem ranging from $3 to $8. In only two States is the compensation of the legislators as much as $1,500 per session, as I understand—New York and Pennsylvania. In two other States the compensation is $1,000—Ohio and Illinois. But in the vast majority of States the compensation is a per diem of $3 to $8, making in sixty days from $180 to $480 as the total pay for the members of the legislatures in the States. Most of the States give the same mileage of 10 cents per mile of travel. New Hampshire and New Jersey give no mileage, and in the latter State the legislators are allowed to travel on passes. We propose here to pay the members of the legislature of that Territory $1,000 each for every session of the legislature. This is an enormous increase of expense fastened upon that Territory, and, Mr. President, it seems we are tending too much in that direction these days.

We ought to hesitate before we encourage this marked tendency to extravagance in the administration of governmental affairs. Jefferson allowed $3,000,000 as a sum sufficient to pay the expenses of conducting this Government for one year. We have just heard it authoritatively stated on this floor that we are to-day wasting from $100,000,000 to $300,000,000 in the administration of this Government. In other words, we are to-day spending $300,000,000 where Jefferson calculated to spend only $1,000,000 in conducting the affairs of this Government. We have made tremendous advance; we have prospered beyond all estimates or imagination even. But I submit we have not advanced in any such proportion as that. We are wasting to-day $100,000,000 where we required in Jefferson's day $1,000,000 as necessary operating expenses of the Government. This same sort of tendency we see cropping out in every direction, and here it is proposed to raise the pay of the legislators of the Territory of Hawaii $600 for each member every time the legislature meets.

Now, passing from that, Mr. President, we reach the next section, section 3, which unquestionably is wise and without objection. It only changes the present law by eliminating the word "biennially."

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. CLAY. As the Senator is discussing sections 1, 2, 3, and so forth, I will ask him whether he has discussed section 5?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have not reached it.

Mr. CLAY. Section 5 is at the beginning of the bill. That is the most serious——

Mr. FLETCHER. That is section 5 of the old act. I am referring to the bill as it is prepared and before us.

Mr. CLAY. Does not section 5 repeal sections 1841 to 1891, inclusive, 1910, and 1912 of the Revised Statutes and the amendments thereto, and those sections of existing law, as I understand, place certain limitations on territorial legislatures in regard to their power to legislate?

On reading those sections I think the Senator will find that they especially provide what the legislature of a Territory may do, how far it can go, to what extent its acts must be submitted to Congress, what indebtedness a territorial legislature can incur. If I understand that section of the bill, all of the laws relating to Territories in the United States generally are repealed, and the limitations that have applied heretofore to Territories are stricken out by this bill and new limitations created; and, as I understand, if this bill becomes a law, then the only limit placed upon the territorial legislatures in regard to legislation and in regard to indorsing indebtedness for persons and corporations must be found in this proposed act which we are considering.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator is correct, and, as I have already suggested, I will offer an amendment when it is appropriate striking out the provisions of this section as embodied in the bill, so as to leave it as in the present law, with simply the words "including laws carrying general appropriations" added, and with the present law standing in full force and effect in so far as it eliminates certain sections of the Revised Statutes as applying to that Territory. In other words, I would not enlarge the number of the sections, as this bill offers to do, but I would leave the present law in effect, only adding, as I have said, the words "including laws carrying general appropriations." That meets the whole difficulty and does away with the trouble we have had about construing the present law, and puts into it expressly the provision that the laws of the United States, "including laws carrying general appropriations," shall apply to the Territory; and I would limit the number of sections which it is proposed to strike out of the Revised Statutes to the number stricken out under the present law. The amendment will speak for itself when it is offered, and I think it meets the criticism suggested by the Senator from Georgia.

With reference to section 4, I shall offer an amendment to the amendment by which the provisions beginning with the word "Provided," on page 4, and continuing to the end of that section, be entirely eliminated. I believe that would relieve the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Wyoming.

Section 5 is an important portion of the bill. It rather limits than enlarges the power now existing in the officers of the Territory with reference to public lands. It may be a question whether Congress ought to have turned over to the Territory the entire jurisdiction and control of public lands amounting to some 1,700,000 acres, but that has been done, and the present land commissioner of the Territory has practically plenary powers with reference to all these public lands. This provision is rather a limitation upon his power, subjects it to some control and supervision, and rather divides the responsibility between him and the governor, and in some instances among him, the governor, and the legislative authority. So that I am inclined to agree that that section is the most important section in the bill and carries a very valuable and important piece of legislation for the benefit of the Territory.

Section 6, likewise, is without objection. There can be no criticism, it seems to me, of the provisions there disqualifying judges and jurors in certain instances therein named. I refer to the section itself, without taking the time of the Senate to discuss it in detail. It speaks for itself, and accompanying the bill is the report of the committee, which is further explanatory.

Section 7 likewise is, to my mind, a valuable provision and is unobjectionable.

Section 8, however, is subject to very grave criticism, I think, and ought not to be adopted by Congress. For the same reason, signified in discussing section 2, we must certainly hesitate before voting this great increase in the salaries of the officers of the Territory. The people are to furnish this money, and they are already beginning to inquire in this country whether or not government is not getting to be a very great luxury to them. They are beginning already to suggest the question whether they are getting enough out of the government to warrant the enormous amount they are paying for it.

It is proposed in this section to increase the governor's salary from $5,000 to $10,000 per annum. It is proposed to increase the salary of the secretary of state from $3,000 to $5,000, the salary of the chief justice of the supreme court from $5,000 to $6,000, of the associate justices of the supreme court from $5,000 to $6,000, of the judges of the circuit court from $3,000 to $4,000, of the district attorney from $3,000 to $5,000, of the United States marshal from $2,500 to $4,000, and the governor shall receive annually, in addition to his salary, the sum of $1,000, instead of $500, as under the present law, for stationery, postage, and the like.

This means, Mr. President, that the increase in salaries provided for in this bill, to be paid by the United States annually, is $20,000.

Section 2 provides that the increase in the compensation of the legislators shall be $27,000. Meeting biennially, it means an increase of $18,500 of expense annually in conducting that government, making a total increase annually of $38,500. That is, the increase of expense carried by this bill is $38,500 every year; an increase of $45,000 in the pay of the legislature, which meets biennially, and that, annually, means $18,500, and an increase in these salaries annually of $20,000, making a total annual increase in the expense of that government of $38,500.

Not only that, but the number of circuit judges for that Territory seems to me out of proportion and unnecessary. There are five counties in the Territory, with a population of some 175,000 men, women, and children—about 15,000 or 20,000 Americans, about 40,000 or less native Hawaiians, and then Japanese, Chinese, Portuguese, and what not. There are probably 30,000 to 40,000 electors, qualified voters, in the Territory, and these people, with an electorate, say, of 40,000, are required to pay $38,500 every year more than they are now paying for the administration of their government.

The circuit judges are seven. There are five counties in the Territory. It would seem proper to decrease the number of circuit judges rather than to increase the salaries of those they now have. In most of the States circuit judges have jurisdiction extending over four or five counties. In the whole State of Florida, with a population of nearly a million, we have only eight circuits, with eight circuit judges, some of the circuits having four to five counties, and here a Territory, with a population of 175,000, wants seven circuit judges, and they want them paid $4,000 each annually.

I submit, Mr. President, that this is unwarranted and it is unreasonable, and I shall offer amendments to this section providing that the governor's salary, instead of $5,000, as now, shall be $7,000. I understand the governor has to do a good deal of entertaining; that he has no mansion; that the Territory provides for him only an office and no residence, and he has to pay rent.

It is said that Hawaii is the most expensive country in the world to live in. I do not know why that should be. The climate is splendid. The soil, where it can be cultivated at all, is fertile. They ought to grow everything they need or require for food purposes. I suppose, like any State or Territory that depends upon one industry alone—sugar, in this instance—other things are unusually high. It might be an inducement to those officials who, it is fair to assume, are foremost in enterprise and in the industrial development of the islands, if denied this enormous increase in salaries, to bend their energies toward the diversification of the industries of the Territory.

There is no reason why that Territory should not produce everything the people require for their food; but it is reported, and I can not dispute it, that it is an expensive part of the world to live in. At the same time, a salary of $5,000 per annum is not very meager compensation. The salaries of the governors of most of the States do not exceed $5,000. I think only 10 States in the Union pay more than $5,000, 22 pay less than $5,000, and a large number of them pay about $5,000. Quite a number of them pay precisely $5,000.

The governor of Hawaii certainly has no greater responsibilities and no more work to do than the governor of the average State, I take it. I am willing, however, to be reasonable about it and to make his salary $7,000 instead of $5,000, but I do think $10,000 is an unwarranted increase. So as to the salary of the secretary of the Territory, in lieu of $3,000 I would make it $4,000, instead of $5,000 as suggested by this bill. I would make the salary of the chief justice of the supreme court of the Territory $5,500, instead of $6,000 as proposed and in lieu of $5,000 as it now is; of the justices of the supreme court, $5,000 instead of $6,000 as proposed; of judges of the circuit court, $3,500 instead of $4,000 as proposed here and in lieu of $3,000 as under the present law. And so on. Instead of fixing the salary of the United States marshal at $4,000—he now receives $2,500—make it $3,000. And make the allowance to the governor for stationery $500, as in the present law, especially if you increase his salary.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me this bill in these respects ought to be amended. Referring now to the last section in the bill, section 9, I commend it, and feel it ought to be adopted for the reasons mentioned in the report accompanying the bill.

I will not detain the Senate further, but I will offer these amendments as we reach the various sections, and for the present I offer an amendment to the amendment now pending, to wit: After the word "States," in line 6, page 4, strike out the colon and all that follows, and insert a period, so as to have the section end with the word "States." That, I think, will meet the objection of the Senator from Wyoming, and I think his objection to the section is perfectly sound.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUMMINS in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, I may not be able to be here to-morrow when this matter comes up. I do not intend to make any extended remarks upon the bill, but I want to call attention to one or two features that seem to me should be considered by the Senator in charge of the bill before it is finally acted upon.

This bill in express terms extends the provisions and powers of the Constitution to Hawaii without limitation. I suppose that is the intention of the committee, so that there will never be any question as to whether or not the restrictions and provisions of the Constitution apply in the legislation, either by the legislature of Hawaii or by Congress, with reference to it, or by the commissioner.

In view of that fact, I would direct the Senator's attention to the provisions of section 5, commencing in line 7, page 5. There are some provisions there for forfeiture of patented titles which, it seems to me, are not sufficient under the Constitution, in that they do not provide for due process of law.

The reference contained on page 6, commencing with line 3, which reads "and noncompliance with the terms of any such certificate, lease, or agreement, or of the law applicable thereto, shall entitle the commissioner, with the approval of the governor, with or without legal process, notice, demand, or previous entry, to retake possession and thereby determine the estate."

If you refer back to the subject of that provision you will find that it includes patented lands, and the restrictions would apply to lands the title to which had passed to the individual under the patent. I merely suggest that for the consideration of the committee and of the Senate between now and the time when the question will be taken up again.

The question involved was considered by the court in the case of Burton v. Platter as to the application of the fifth amendment to the Constitution. The fifth amendment to the Constitution relates to the United States Government and to Territories. The fifteenth amendment relates to the right of the State to do this. The Senate is thoroughly familiar with the decision that held that the fifth amendment is not a limitation upon the power of the States, but is a limitation upon the Federal Government itself or a Territory.

It may be that that language will need some consideration and some change exempting fee-simple titles that pass under a patent from the operation of the forfeiture clause or without the due process of law. I have made these remarks at the present time because I may not be present when the bill is next considered.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I will say in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to the first section of the bill, I think it is proper. The object of that first section was simply to give to the Territory of Hawaii the privileges that have been withheld from it by the construction of the statute in the department. Hawaii was relieved from the general statutes relating to Territories because it had an organic act of its own which covered all of the ground embraced by the general statutes applying to the Territories which had no special and specific statutes or organic acts. It was thought by the authorities of Hawaii that they should be entitled, notwithstanding that, to such privileges from the National Government as relate to the scientific branches, to the hydrographic, the topographic, and the soil surveys, forestry, and so forth; and the sole object of this first section is that Hawaii may share in that part of the activities of the Government of the United States.

In regard to the criticism of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], without discussing it now, I wish to call attention to section 4 of the act for the government of the Philippine Islands of February 6, 1905, the last one that was passed, which provides—

> That for the purpose of aiding in the construction, equipment, operation, and maintenance of such railroads, using steam, electricity, or other power, in the Philippine Islands as the Philippine government may hereafter specifically authorize, the said government is empowered to enter into a contract of guaranty with any railroad company organized pursuant to the laws of said government or of the United States or any State thereof undertaking to construct, equip, operate, and maintain any such railroad, whereby the said government shall guarantee interest, at not exceeding 4 per cent per annum upon first lien bonds to be issued by such company, properly secured by mortgage or deed of trust upon the said railroad, its equipment, franchises, and other property, real, personal, and mixed, then owned and thereafter to be acquired.
> Provided, That in no event shall the total annual contingent liability of said government under the guaranties authorized by this section at any time exceed the sum of $1,200,000, and no such guaranty shall continue for a longer period than thirty years.

The statement has been made that there has been no law ever enacted by the United States like that which is contemplated in this Hawaiian bill. I call attention to this to show that in preparing the Hawaiian bill the privileges which had been granted to the Philippine government were taken under consideration, and those privileges were put in this bill for Hawaii on the ground that special conditions exist in Hawaii, the same as in the Philippines. The only change made in this bill is that, while under the Philippine law the Philippine government can loan its credit for $1,202,000, in this bill Hawaii can only loan it for $200,000.

Mr. President, the consideration of the bill can not be concluded to-day, and I will make just a few observations in reference to what has been said in criticism of it. Then I will ask that the bill go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill may now be laid aside, to be taken up at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will not object to the request, but I feel that I ought to state that to-morrow and the next day I shall be occupied in work on a special committee, and I shall not be able to be present. I am perfectly willing to let the Senator from New York have his own preference in this matter, but I shall not be able to be present to-morrow because of an engagement on a special committee.

Mr. DEPEW. I want to gratify the Senator from Florida in every way. My only anxiety is to get the bill through. It is a very important measure. Can the Senator state some day?

Mr. FLETCHER. On Monday, the very next day after Saturday, I will be prepared to go on with the bill. Friday and Saturday are days assigned to the work of a special committee, and I am obliged to be absent from the Senate on those days.

Mr. DEPEW. I will substitute Monday for to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside, to be taken up at the conclusion of the morning business on Monday. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask that the bill creating a system of postal savings banks may be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. BAILEY addressed the Senate. After having spoken for ten minutes,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5705) to authorize the issue and sale of certificates of indebtedness against the reclamation fund.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside; and the Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Texas will proceed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, this bill is subject to every objection which can be urged against any measure. It is objectionable, in the first place, because Congress has no constitutional authority to pass it; it is objectionable, in the second place, because it violates the fundamental principle of all good government by requiring the United States to engage in a business which belongs distinctly to individuals and corporations; and it is objectionable in the third place because it will produce more harm than good in its practical operation. Either of those objections, if sustained, would be enough to condemn it; and if I can sustain all of them, as I believe I can, its proponents and its advocates ought to abandon it.

No rule for construing the Constitution of the United States that has ever yet found a general acceptance among the judges and the statesmen of this country will justify this legislation. It is so elementary that I would offend the intelligence of Senators by entering upon an elaborate argument to prove that we must find a warrant in the Constitution for anything and everything we do. I do not mean, of course, that we can only exercise those powers which have been specifically granted, because I recognize as fully as any man what are commonly called the "implied powers," though I do not think that expression either fortunate or accurate. The wise men who framed our Constitution did not leave the powers of the Government created by it to implication, but they expressly authorized Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" all of the powers which had been expressly granted; and to be exact in both thought and speech, we must recognize that the power to do whatever may be necessary and proper to the execution of those powers expressly enumerated in the Constitution is as distinctly granted as those powers themselves. But whether we follow the usual practice of describing them as implied powers or adopt what I consider the better practice of treating them as expressly granted powers can make no difference in the conclusion which we must reach on this occasion, and I dismiss it as immaterial in this connection.

This proposition I lay down as incontrovertible: Congress can pass no law except in execution of some power expressly conferred on it by the Constitution. Of course I freely concede that Congress has a wide choice of means in executing those powers; but it is obviously true that Congress has no right to employ any means to execute a power unless that power itself has been granted to it by the Constitution. Therefore the first step which we must take in testing the constitutionality of any measure is to read the Constitution and see if Congress has been authorized to do what that measure proposes. If we find a power there to do the thing proposed, then the manner in which it shall be done is within our discretion, subject only to the limitation stated by Chief Justice Marshall in an early case, that the means we employ shall be appropriate to the end and not prohibited by the letter or the spirit of the Constitution.

To illustrate what I mean, let me state some examples. Congress has the power to lay and collect taxes, and in order to execute that power it may provide for the appointment of revenue collectors, establish treasuries and subtreasuries, and under the decision in the great case of McCulloch v. The State of Maryland, it may incorporate a bank for the purpose of collecting and disbursing those taxes. Again, Congress has the power to raise and support armies, and it, therefore, has the power to provide for the enlistment of soldiers, for the appointment of officers, and for the compensation of both, together with anything else which may be necessary and proper to maintain an army and render it effective. Congress has the power to establish post-offices and post-roads, and may therefore provide for the appointment of postmasters, for transporting the mail, fix postage charges, and make all other necessary and proper regulations. It would be useless to extend these illustrations, for I do not need to tell those who do me the honor to hear what I am saying that the means must be merely a way of reaching the end. They need not, indeed, be the only way in any given case, but they must be a necessary and a proper way, and we must never lose sight of that limitation.

The power to establish a military academy may well be deemed an appropriate means of raising an army; but I hardly think that any man would be so blind to all true relations as to contend that Congress could establish an agricultural college under its power to raise and support armies. Nor do I think that any man would seriously contend that the establishment of a factory for the manufacture of boots and shoes would be an appropriate means of executing the power to establish post-offices and post-roads. These are extreme examples, but they clearly illustrate the point which I am seeking to emphasize. There are instances where the inadaptability of the means to the end is not so well defined, and in many instances the means which are necessary and appropriate and the means which are not necessary and appropriate approach so near the line which separates them that it is difficult and sometimes impossible for any court to say what is and what is not constitutional. That difficulty, however, never presents itself to the mind or to the conscience of a legislator. He knows perfectly well when he votes for any given measure whether or not he is voting for it in good faith and for the purpose of executing a given power. The principle which I have briefly stated if applied to the measure under consideration demonstrates its unconstitutionality because its most earnest advocates have not and can not refer it to any power enumerated in the Constitution or satisfy us that it is a necessary and proper means of executing any of those powers.

WITHOUT CONSTITUTIONAL SANCTION.

There have been four clauses of the Constitution suggested as authorizing this legislation; and with the permission of the Senate I will examine each of them.

One distinguished Senator has suggested, more in the form of a query, however, than of a declaration, that this bill might be defended under the commerce clause of the Constitution; but before he resumed his seat his own mental processes had refuted his proposition, and he did not press it. Others less clear of thought have adopted the view which he suggested, and while they have not advanced it in the open Senate, they have insisted on it with more or less earnestness in their private conversation. A moment's reflection, Mr. President, will convince any man whose mind is capable of making an analysis that it is utterly absurd to assert that the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce includes the power to receive deposits from the people and then redeposit their money with banks situated in the same State. Banking is not commerce; but, sir, if it were admitted that the banking business is commerce within the meaning of the Constitution, such an admission would not justify this bill, because the only commerce which is subject to federal regulation is a commerce among the several States, or with Indian tribes, or with foreign nations. The Supreme Court has expressly decided that one who deals in foreign bills of exchange is not engaged in foreign commerce, and surely it is not an interstate transaction when a citizen deposits his money with the postmaster of the town or city in which he lives. To receive money at the post-office and to deposit it in a bank situated in the same community is not commerce at all; and certainly it is not interstate or foreign commerce, which is alone subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

Some have claimed that this bill is valid under that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and it was to connect it with that provision of the Constitution that the Senator from New York offered his amendment. Recognizing that the power to pass this bill must be referred to some specific grant or grants, he has sought to bring it under the borrowing clause of the Constitution. In other words, understanding that Congress has the power to borrow money and that in exercising such power it can receive the money which it seeks to borrow at its post-offices as well as its Treasury, he has proposed an amendment providing that the money deposited with these various post-offices shall be invested, so far as possible, in the securities of the General Government. That amendment might make it possible for the court to hold this bill constitutional, but it would still be none the less unconstitutional, according to the conscience of every Senator, because we all know that its purpose is not to borrow money, and to incorporate such a provision in it would be a palpable subterfuge invented to deny the court the right to consider the bill according to its real purpose. I understand, however, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York, though approved by the President in a recent New York speech as necessary to make the bill a constitutional one, has been abandoned.

The power to borrow money was vested in Congress so that it might sustain the Government in those extraordinary situations when sufficient taxes could not be collected to meet its current and necessary expenditures. Such situations had arisen in the history of every country in the world, and our fathers understood that they would arise from time to time in our own country. They therefore wisely supplemented the power of taxation with the power to borrow; and I am of the opinion that Congress would have possessed that power as a necessary and proper means of executing other powers even if it had not been expressly granted. It was, however, expressly granted in a clause as brief as literary skill could frame and as plain as the English language could make it. Congress can call on the people for a loan, and can evidence its indebtedness to them by bonds bearing interest and payable at a certain time, or by notes bearing no interest and intended to circulate as money, or by certificates of indebtedness payable on demand or payable at a fixed day, with or without interest. The form in which the indebtedness may be acknowledged is within the reasonable discretion of Congress, and it may adopt, within certain limits, any form acceptable to those who are willing to lend it their money. Not only may the Government provide the form of acknowledging its indebtedness, but it may also provide the time and place at which this borrowed money may be delivered to it. It may require it to be deposited in such national banks as it may designate, or it may require it to be brought to its subtreasuries, or it can require it to be delivered at the post-offices throughout the land, for while receiving that money would not constitute any proper function of a post-office or post-road, the postmaster could be authorized to accept it and receipt for it under that plain provision which authorizes Congress to borrow money on the credit of the United States.

I do not deny, and no sane man would deny, that this bill is perfectly constitutional if its purpose is to borrow money; but will any Senator stand here and assert that the purpose of those who prepared it, or that his own purpose in voting for it, is to borrow money? No Senator is so foolish as to believe that, and no Senator would be so uncandid as to say it; but if there should happen to be any such, I only need to read to him the several provisions of the bill. The Government does not intend to use this money in defraying its expenses or in redeeming its obligations, but takes it simply and only for the purpose of depositing it in a bank, to be held there until its creditor shall demand the return of his money. The postmaster receives it from the citizen with one hand and passes it with the other hand over to the bank. This does not amount to borrowing money. It is both in purpose and in effect merely a plan by which the Government guarantees the depositor against all loss. A citizen withdraws his money from the bank and deposits it at the post-office; the Government then takes the money and redeposits it with the bank; and the sum of that transaction is that the citizen then holds the guaranty of the Government instead of the bank, and the bank is answerable to the Government instead of to the citizen. But, Mr. President, even if by any stretch of the imagination this could be considered borrowing money on the credit of the United States, it would still be unauthorized by the Constitution, because that power was conferred on Congress in order to enable the Government to perform its functions, and we were never authorized to borrow money from individuals in order that we might lend it to corporations.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. I will.

Mr. CARTER. Will it inconvenience the Senator to ask a question at this point?

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to know if it is the contention of the Senator that the power to borrow money is dependent upon the disposition Congress may think proper to make of the money after it has been borrowed.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is undoubtedly true. Surely the Senator from Montana will not contend that Congress has the right to borrow money for any purpose except for governmental purposes.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, my question goes to the merits in this way: Must Congress in negotiating a loan condition that loan on a disposition of the money in accordance with the Senator's views or the views entertained by Congress with reference to the disposition of the money after it has been borrowed; or, in other words, when Congress authorizes a loan and that loan is negotiated, is it necessary to the validity of the bonds or security issued that the Congress should always thereafter make such disposition of the money as in the judgment of the courts might seem to comport with the Constitution?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no, Mr. President; when Congress has authorized our executive officers to sell the bonds of the United States we are bound by every obligation of good faith to pay them, no matter whether that money is wisely or foolishly, honestly or dishonestly, expended. All I mean to say is that the power to borrow money, like every other power conferred on us by the Constitution, was intended to serve a governmental purpose, and as taking money from a citizen, on deposit, and then transferring it to a neighboring bank on a redeposit is not a governmental function, we have no power to borrow for such a purpose.

The third clause of the Constitution, to which this bill has been referred, is the one which confers on Congress the power to establish post-offices and post-roads, and this suggestion comes entirely from the circumstance that this money is to be received at the post-offices. There is not the slightest pretense that receiving deposits from the people or transferring those deposits to the banks bears any relation whatever to the establishment and operation of a post-office or a post-road. The truth is, and the whole truth is, that the post-office has been selected to serve the purpose of this bill purely as a matter of convenience. If the Government were maintaining an internal-revenue office in every city, town, and village of the land, with post-offices at only the more important places, this bill would have provided for the deposit of this money with the internal-revenue collectors instead of with the postmasters. I do not forget, of course, that there has been some attempt to justify this new departure from the original purpose and function of a post-office by referring to the law, passed many years ago, which authorized the post-offices to issue money orders. Had I been a Member of the Congress which passed that law I would, perhaps, have voted against it. Indeed, it is practically certain that I would have done so, because it goes to the very verge of congressional authority and was certain to become a precedent and furnish an argument for going still further, as has been done in this very debate.

But, sir, I would not have doubted then, and I do not doubt now, that both in its origin and in its purpose that law was a valid one and intended in good faith to perfect our postal system. The public had long been in the habit of sending money through the mails. That practice had always been recognized as proper, but it was never considered entirely safe, and the post-office money order was devised to make the mails serve a proper and a lawful purpose with greater safety. The bill before us now presents a very different question. There is absolutely no pretense that the deposit of private money with a postmaster, and the redeposit of it by him in a bank, has, or is intended to have, any connection with the use of the mails. It is a fiscal operation pure and simple, without the remotest relation to a post-office or a post-road as they were understood by the fathers when they framed our Constitution or as they are understood by us to-day. The Congress of the United States has just as much right and power to require our postmasters to act as commission merchants as it has to require them to act as bankers. If we can pass this law which permits a citizen to leave his money at the post-office and directs the postmaster what disposition to make of it, then, sir, we can pass another law authorizing men to leave their cotton or their corn, their cattle or their horses, with the postmaster and impose upon him the duty of caring for them and disposing of them according to our directions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BAILEY. I will.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator from Texas leaves the question of money orders, I understand that he justifies that legislation upon the ground that it is a way of transmitting money through the mails. But as I understand——

Mr. BAILEY. I would not exactly phrase it that way. I would say that it is a way of transmitting matter more safely through the mails. Whatever the letter might contain, it was for the purpose of insuring its safe delivery to the addressee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Either view of it will serve as a sufficient foundation for what I was going to ask the Senator. As I understand the law which provides for the issuance of money orders, there is no requirement that they shall be transmitted through the mails.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They may be redeemed, and often are redeemed, at the post-office where they are issued.

Mr. BAILEY. That has been done recently; and I think it is a clear abuse of his authority for the Postmaster-General of the United States to advertise that men can buy post-office orders payable to themselves and hold them as a claim against the Government without any intention of using them for their proper and lawful purpose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then the Senator thinks that is an unconstitutional exercise of authority?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And the Senator, then, does not justify the law which permits it?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not.

There is one other clause of the Constitution to which its advocates refer this bill. They declare that under the power to coin money and regulate its value Congress has the right to keep it in circulation. I utterly deny that proposition in the sense which they intend. The power and the duty of the Government is to provide the country with an adequate circulation, and whenever so much of that circulation has been withdrawn, either through actual destruction or through the fear of loss, as to leave an inadequate supply, Congress possesses the power, and Congress rests under the duty, of providing an additional circulation to take the place of that which has ceased to perform the functions of money. But, sir, when Congress has exercised that power and performed that duty and the money so coined or issued has passed into the hands of the individual citizen, it is his private property and he has a right to do whatever he pleases with it. He can deposit it in a bank, or lock it up in his safe, or bury it in the ground. The Government has no more right to determine for him what he shall do with his money than what he shall do with his land. The only exception is that Governments from time immemorial have assumed the power to limit the rate of interest on money, but in that respect only have they assumed to deal with a citizen's money under any rule different from what they apply to his other property.

Let me put this proposition to a test which will at once and completely expose its fallacy. We will all agree that if Congress possesses the power to force money from its hiding places and into circulation it has a right to select its own way of executing that power. That is a constitutional truism. If, therefore, Congress has the power to force hidden money into the channels of circulation, it can exercise that power either by imposing penalties on the men who hide it or by offering premiums to the men who will put it in circulation. Will any Senator assert that Congress could make it a crime for a citizen of the United States to keep his own money in his own way? I think not. I hardly think that any man will stand here and declare that the Federal Government could send a man to prison because he kept his money in a strong box at home and refused to deposit it in a bank or even with a postmaster. And yet, sir, Congress would have that power without any shadow of a doubt if the Constitution authorizes it to force money out of hiding and into circulation; for whether it will offer a premium for doing so or impose a penalty for refusing to do so is merely a matter of congressional discretion. With the power granted, the means are merely a matter of legislative selection, and whether we shall tempt men by premiums to do what we want done or terrorize them into doing it by punishing their refusal is purely a matter within our own choice.

These four clauses of the Constitution, Mr. President, are the only ones to which its advocates have attempted to refer this bill. Of course I am not unmindful that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] did say to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] that Congress possessed the power to pass this bill under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution. Nor do I forget that the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] a few days ago met our challenge to point out a particular provision of the Constitution which authorized them to pass this bill with a counter challenge for us to point out the particular provision which prohibits the passage of it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. CARTER. I realize that the Senator from Texas desires to be entirely fair in his statement of my position.

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. CARTER. I undertook to present the fact clearly to the Senate that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], who had just addressed the body, did not contend that the proposed legislation was prohibited by any clause of the Constitution, and that, therefore, the only remaining question was whether there was any authority for its establishment, express or implied. That is the position I intended to state.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Montana is a lawyer of long experience, as well as a Senator of great ability; and it was painful to see him reduced to the pitiful necessity of attempting to justify the constitutionality of his bill by reversing the rule of constitutional construction. If there had been a better argument, he would have had it at his ready command, and the fact that he offered that one was a positive proof that a better one could not be offered. The Senator from Montana knows as well as I do that here we can do nothing unless the Constitution authorizes us to do it, whereas the rule in the legislature of a State is that they may do anything which the constitution does not forbid; in other words, a state constitution is a limitation on legislative power, while the Federal Constitution is an enumeration of congressional power.

Mr. President, if I have not already succeeded in making it plain to the Senate, I have still another and even a better way of proving that this is not a bill to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations; nor a bill to borrow money on the credit of the United States; nor a bill to establish post-offices and post-roads; nor a bill to coin money and regulate the value thereof. I can prove from the bill itself, as well as from an authoritative statement of its purpose, that it is not intended to execute any of those great powers. The title of it declares that it is a bill "to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes." Broadly translated, this simply means that the Government of the United States is required to guarantee bank deposits in cases where the depositor will allow it to select the bank and accept 2 per cent for his money. But even this is the means by which they seek to reach an end, and is not the end itself. Merely forcing the Government to guarantee bank deposits would be an idle and wholly useless performance in itself, and nobody would advocate a law of that kind except to serve some purpose, and that purpose has never been more distinctly stated than by President Roosevelt in his message to Congress on December 3, 1907. In one sentence he commended the postal savings-bank system to the favorable consideration of Congress, and in the next sentence he stated the object of it. Although that message is familiar to all Senators, I will read this particular passage of it to the Senate. These are his words:

> I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress a postal savings-bank system, as recommended by the Postmaster-General. The primary object is to encourage among our people economy and thrift, and by the use of postal savings banks to give them an opportunity to husband their resources, particularly those who have not the facilities at hand for depositing their money in savings banks.

In the same paragraph he mentions other advantages which the establishment of this system will bring us; but the important point in this connection is his perfectly candid assertion that the primary object of this legislation is to encourage economy and thrift among our people. Is that the purpose of this bill? The Senator from Montana nods his assent. Then, if the Senator from Montana will point us to any clause in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to enact a law for such a purpose, I will resume my seat and vote for this bill—and I offer him an opportunity now to do that.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I fear there would be too long a space between the Senator's sentences.

Mr. BAILEY. Before the Senator could do that, there would be a very long space.

If the Federal Government is authorized to encourage thrift and economy among the people, then I freely admit that Congress has the power to establish a system of postal savings banks, if that is a necessary and proper means of accomplishing such a result. But, sir, you will search the Constitution of this Republic in vain for any intimation that Congress possesses that power, nor is there a single clause in that great document which can be tortured into an implication of it. I am one of those old-fashioned Democrats who do not believe that any government can encourage economy and thrift except by the enactment of such wise and equal laws as will permit every man to employ his energy and his intellect with a wholesome freedom, and leave him to enjoy the fruits of his own exertion, diminished only by his fair contribution to the government's support. An economy and a thrift born of such a system make a broad and safe foundation upon which we can rear a mighty superstructure of agriculture, commerce, and manufacture; but an economy and a thrift into which a government must tease its people would be of little value anywhere and of no value whatever in this country. Like other products of the forcing or hot-house process, they might be good to look at or to talk about, but they can never possess that virility and that resistance which alone can make them a helpful factor in a civilization like ours. But, sir, if I go too far in denying the efficacy of a law-made economy and thrift, I do not err when I maintain that the power to encourage and cultivate them, if existing in any government, was left to the States and was not conferred on the United States.

As the Senate has doubtless observed, I have not thought it worth my while, Mr. President, to read a line from any law book or from the Constitution itself in support of my contention, because it is so plain as to render that unnecessary; and if it were not so plain, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] has relieved me from that necessity by the very luminous address which he delivered several days ago, and in which he cited all the authorities which the case requires. No man has, and no man will, and no man can answer his citations.

NOT A GOVERNMENTAL FUNCTION.

But even, Mr. President, if this bill were consistent with the Constitution I could not support it, because it is inconsistent with that fundamental theory which requires the Government to abstain from all business which can be and ought to be conducted by individuals or corporations. There have been differences of opinion in all countries, and there have been differences of opinion in this country, as to whether certain functions belong properly to the banks or to the Government. Wise and patriotic men have believed that the issuance of notes intended to circulate as money is a proper function of a bank, while other men of equal patriotism and wisdom have contended that the Government alone should exercise that power; but, sir, there has never been until very recently any difference of opinion on the proposition that receiving deposits and making loans is a function of a bank and not a function of the Government. Of course, I am familiar with the great case of McCulloch v. The State of Maryland, in which the Supreme Court of the United States sustained the constitutionality of an act incorporating a bank; but, sir, all lawyers perfectly understand that the decision in that case was predicated on the ground that the bank had been created to aid in certain fiscal operations of the Government. No man connected with that case—neither the lawyers for the State of Maryland who assailed the constitutionality of the law, nor the lawyers for the General Government who defended it—insisted that Congress had any right to create a bank with no power except to receive deposits and make loans. No judge who sat in that famous case expressed or intimated any opinion that would sanction this bill, and I venture to say that until the propaganda for the establishment of a system of postal savings banks was inaugurated in this country no man ever supposed that the Government of the United States could either engage itself or could authorize others to engage in a business of this kind.

But, sir, I do not need to rely upon the technical knowledge of lawyers or on the decision of the courts in a matter which so plainly addresses itself to the common sense of the average man. If receiving deposits and making loans is a proper function of the Government, then, sir, it is not a proper function of the banks, and the Government ought to exclude them from that business. You must admit that either the Government is engaged in a business which properly belongs to the banks, or else that the banks are engaged in a business which properly belongs to the Government when they are both engaged in the same business. When did it become either the duty or the right of this Government to become a custodian of the people's cash? I have been taught to believe that it is the duty of the Government to appoint officers to prevent thieves from taking my money by force and to establish courts to prevent rascals from taking it by fraud, but I have never supposed that it was either the duty or the right of the Government to assume the custody or to control the disposition of my money. That should always be left to the citizen himself, and the fact that he is incapable of doing it in a proper way can not devolve upon the Government an obligation to do it for him. Have we reached a halting point in our progress and must we now reverse the old rule that the people should take care of the Government and teach our children hereafter that the Government shall take care of the people? How long can we maintain that sturdy self-reliance which for a century has so distinguished the American character after the Government has relieved us from the necessity and the trouble of investing what we have been able to save?

If it be wise to discourage men in their individual efforts by teaching them that the Government can do and should do for them rather than leave them to do for themselves, then, sir, this bill is a wise one and ought to pass. If, however, the maximum of individual effort and minimum of governmental interference is the true policy of a free government, then this bill ought not to pass, and it is infinitely better that the improvident shall never save anything than that the provident shall be taught to look to the Government instead of to themselves. The harm which such a policy will inflict upon this country can not be measured in dollars, and all the money that will be deposited in all of the post-offices of this country, if multiplied by itself a thousand times, can not compensate for the injury which will be done by this legislation to the character of our people and the form of our government.

They tell us that a large number of men can not take care of their own money. Doubtless that is true of some, and I deeply regret it; but it is not true of many. I sincerely wish that every man in this Republic could earn a competence and could take good care of it after he had earned it; but, sir, we can never hope to witness that condition. It does not exist to-day; it has never existed in any of the days which have passed; and it will never exist in any of the days which are to come. It is an iridescent dream, fit only for a socialist to cherish, and in seeking it through a governmental interference with the citizen and his private business we will only hinder those who are striving to do what can be done. The struggle between the weak and the strong is one of the tragedies of this life, and yet out of it some benefit comes to the weak as well as to the strong. It is the conflict, sir, which develops in us those high qualities which conquer every difficulty and enable us to make fate our servant rather than our master. It is as true in the business world as it is in the intellectual or the physical world that the use of a faculty increases its efficiency; and a personal attention to his business, no matter how small it may be, is a positive benefit to every man. It teaches him business habits, cultivates a business prudence, and develops a self-reliance. These are great virtues in a free republic; and whenever the Government comes to each man's door and offers to relieve him from a work which develops them, it ought at least to offer him something as good as they are in return.

Does this bill make such an offer? No, sir. The only advantage which it proposes is the absolute safety of the citizen's deposit, coupled with an interest of 2 per cent. The safety is no compensation for the disuse of those faculties which are so essential to men in a country like this; and the 2 per cent interest would hardly tempt any except the very rich or the utterly worthless to surrender the management of their business to the Government. People of great fortunes can well afford to accept 2 per cent, because even that low rate of interest will yield them an income sufficient to satisfy their most extravagant desires; but, sir, a man of less than independent means is foolish to accept such a rate of interest on his money, for if he has sense enough to perform the duties and to exercise the privileges of an American citizen, he can make more than that by using his own money in his own way. The very men for whose benefit you intend this legislation are the ones above all others who need the business education which the management of their own affairs will give them, and who also need a better return on their moderate savings than your 2 per cent. In almost every town where one of these postal depositories is to be established there is a local building and loan association through which the poor man may procure a home and which will yield him a much larger per cent on his savings than you propose to give him. As a stockholder in a building and loan association it is his duty to familiarize himself with its transactions, and he constantly obtains some new suggestion which is of value to him; but as a depositor with the Government he is practically excluded from giving any thought to the management of his property. He accepts the Government's guaranty, coupled with the 2 per cent, and leaves all the rest to the Government, thus absolutely and completely withdrawing himself from participation in business of every kind so far as his postal savings account is concerned.

Mr. President, this bill commends itself to some of its supporters because it prepares the way for another bill which is to follow it. If Congress can be persuaded at this session to put the Government into the business of the banks, then, sir, it will be easier at the next session to put the banks into the business of the Government. If it is competent for the Government to engage in the business of receiving deposits and making loans, which is essentially and purely a banking business, then who shall deny the right of the banks to issue currency and control the volume of it, although that is the business of the Government? It will be difficult, sir, to justify the Government's going into the banking business, and then deny the banks the privilege of going into the Government's business. The same principle which forbids individuals and corporations to engage in the business of the Government forbids the Government to engage in the business of individuals or corporations; and I warn my Democratic associates that in supporting this bill, they commit themselves to a principle which will estop them from opposing the creation of a central national bank.

I can easily remember when stalwart Republican leaders were demanding with wearisome iteration that the Government should be taken out of the banking business. They were then urging a retirement of the greenbacks and a substitution of national bank notes for them. In that day they insisted that the Government should not even issue notes intended to circulate as money, though that is a function which always belongs to the Government and was never the proper business of a bank; but in this day they do not scruple to insist that the Government shall receive deposits and make loans, which was always the business of a bank, and never a function of this Government. That these men should pass from one extreme to another does not surprise me in the least, because the mental quality which will adopt one extreme will adopt an opposite extreme. There has never been a time in the history of the world, and there will never come a time in the history of the world, when the advocates of special privilege will not embrace a paternalistic or even a socialistic proposition, if a political exigency requires it; and it is not singular to me that the men who now favor the policy of requiring the Government to receive deposits will be the same men in the next Congress, or, perhaps, in the next session of this Congress, who will support a bill authorizing a great central national bank to issue and control the volume of our currency.

The one saving grace of this bill is that it limits the sum which may be deposited by one person; but the studied effort to limit its application is a confession that the principle is not a sound one, because a sound principle does not need to be so limited, and the wider the field in which it operates the greater good it will accomplish. Not only have they limited the amount which they will permit any citizen to deposit, but they have attempted to still further neutralize the bad effect of those limited deposits by providing that the Government shall immediately redeposit that money in the banks of the same community where it has been received. As the bill was originally drawn and introduced, it permitted the grossest kind of favoritism between banks, and it was so justly criticised in that respect that its authors have sought to escape that criticism by providing in the present bill that the post-office deposits of every community shall be divided among the banks of that community according to their capital and surplus, provided, of course, that they are willing to receive the money upon the conditions prescribed by the Government. It is undoubtedly true, Mr. President, that this provision of the bill, if administered in good faith, will render impossible that favoritism which, under the old bill, would inevitably have become a scandal. But, sir, in striving to avoid that objection, they have made the real purpose of this bill so manifest that no man of fair intelligence can be deceived about it. Let me make it plain by an illustration. Suppose that in a given community there are three banks, each patronized by A, B, and C, respectively. Now, sir, if each of them withdraws his money from his bank and deposits it with the postmaster, this law requires that the postmaster shall forthwith redeposit that money with those three banks, according to their capital and surplus. If it should happen that these three deposits do not run according to the capital and surplus of the banks, then the Government has done one of those banks an injustice by inviting its depositor to withdraw a larger sum than it will put back in it; and it has done another bank a special favor by putting in it a larger sum than was withdrawn by its depositor. But I waive all question of that kind, and assume that the arrangement as between the banks is entirely just and equal. That assumption, however, brings me to the very point which I now desire to impress upon the minds of Senators, which is that the net result of this operation is simply and only to make the Government guarantee these bank deposits.

THE REAL OBJECT.

This is not a party question, and yet I can not refrain from reminding all Republican Senators of the bitter reproach which their orators and editors uttered against us two years ago because we ventured to declare in favor of a law compelling all banks to guarantee the deposits of every bank. I did not then, and I do not now, subscribe to the justice or the wisdom of that policy, but I affirm without the slightest hesitation that it is wiser and more just than the policy embodied in this bill. Our proposition was to make the banks guarantee each other's deposits by compelling them to contribute to a common fund out of which all losses should be paid. Every bank is vitally interested in the solvency of every other bank—so much so that it is a frequent occurrence when one bank in a community is in imminent danger of a failure for the other banks to take it over, even at a loss, in the hope of restoring confidence and preventing the withdrawal of money from solvent institutions.

This common interest was supposed by many to be a sufficient ground for the establishment of a common fund to which all banks should be required to contribute, and from which all losses should be paid. It was a proposal to make men engaged in a common business, subject to a common danger, and resting under a common duty, provide a common fund in which all should have a common interest, and which should be used for their common protection. No contribution was exacted from anyone except from the class mainly affected, and the only question involved was how far the public had a right to insure its financial repose by compelling certain corporations to guarantee the contracts of each other. I thought then, and I think now, that such a law goes altogether too far; but, sir, it did not approach the extreme to which this bill has gone. You will not only collect from all banks to make good the losses incurred by some banks, but if the assets of those insolvent banks and the bonds for which you have provided are not sufficient to discharge their indebtedness to the Government, the loss falls upon the Public Treasury, to which every man, woman, and child in this country must contribute. The Democratic plan confined all contributions to the banks, but this bill levies those contributions on every class. The man who never owned a dollar's worth of bank stock in his life and the widow who never made a bank deposit in her life may each be called upon to repair their losses, because when all of the assets have been exhausted the balance must come from the Public Treasury.

If you tell me that the chance of these losses becoming a charge upon all the people of the United States is so remote that it need not be considered, I answer that the chances of a loss to depositors under our present state and national-banking systems are likewise so small that they might fairly be treated as a negligible quantity. When you consider the enormous deposits in our banks and consider the losses which all the depositors have suffered during the last twenty years, the danger seems out of proportion to the measure by which you are seeking to avert it. If in the earlier time, when banks were managed with less wisdom and prudence and when bank failures often culminated in a total loss to their depositors, some statesman had proposed a law like this, he could have supported it with a practical argument of great value; but, sir, in the face of the steady progress toward a full protection of depositors which we have been making through a vigilant supervision of all banks, it seems utterly unnecessary, even from a business point of view, to put the Government itself into the banking business. I favor the governmental supervision of banks, but I seriously object to a substitution of the Government for the banks. You denounced our proposition as socialistic. What shall we call yours? It is socialism run mad.

They endeavor to reconcile us to the Government's unconstitutional and unwarranted intrusion into the domain of individual or corporate business by telling us that this system of postal savings banks will bring a vast sum of money from its hiding places and make it available for the use of men. I have seen the amount they thus calculate on enticing into circulation estimated as high as $1,000,000,000. Of course the gentlemen who promulgated that estimate are sincere, but they are not well informed. There are, in round numbers, $3,000,000,000 of coin, notes, and certificates outside of the United States Treasury, and of this amount $1,500,000,000 are held by the banks and trust companies as cash reserves and for other purposes, leaving only $1,500,000,000 in actual circulation among the people.

Every man familiar with the habits and business methods of our people can easily understand how this money is distributed, and it is almost susceptible of mathematical demonstration that only a small fraction of it is hoarded. There are more than 30,000,000 adults in the United States, and all of them carry pocket money ranging from a few dollars to several hundred. In every home at least a moderate sum must be kept to meet daily marketing expenses; every storehouse, hotel, and café must keep a sum of money within their cashier's easy reach; the great transportation companies collect millions every day, and in transmitting it from the places where it is collected to the places where it must be disbursed always have a vast amount of cash which is not represented in their bank balances; and there is not an enterprise of any character or magnitude which does not find it necessary to keep some cash at its principal offices. These demands for actual money practically absorb the $1,500,000,000 for which we must account and leave but a paltry sum which is hoarded through a fear of the banks or for any other reason, and most of what is hoarded now would still be hoarded no matter how thoroughly the Government might guarantee its deposit, because it is the property of men whose peculiar disposition keeps it where it is. I would not be willing for the Government of the United States to engage in the business of a banker even if that were the only way of inducing these timid or miserly men to put their money where better men could use it; and thoughtful men, even though their aversion to such a policy is not as great as mine, will hesitate to approve it when such a slight result can be produced by it.

A PERNICIOUS POLICY.

The bill first puts the Government in competition with the banks by inviting the people to withdraw their deposits from those banks and place them with the post-offices, and then practices the grossest kind of a discrimination in favor of its own depositors. The citizens of every State with money on deposit in commercial banks must pay taxes on it, but their neighbors who deposit their money with the postmaster will pay no taxes on it. This is not only a discrimination between our citizens, but it will withdraw from the taxation of States, counties, and municipalities a vast sum of money, if your bill works as you say it will. It is true that you have not stipulated in express terms that these certificates of deposit are exempt from state, county, and municipal taxation, but the court must hold that they are exempt if it holds that in issuing them the Government was performing one of its functions. In other words, Mr. President, if these post-office depository receipts are issued in the execution of a governmental power they are no more subject to the taxation of another sovereignty than the bonds or the notes of the United States. If I am right in this view of the matter, you not only offer the depositor with the Government an interest of 2 per cent, but you also offer to exempt him from taxation, which in all places would be equal to an additional 2 per cent, and in many places to an advantage even greater than that.

What, sir, must be the effect of this policy of the Government in paying 2 per cent on deposits and making those deposits free from all taxation? Unless the good sense of the people defeats it, the inevitable effect must be that men will be induced to withdraw their money from the banks and to deposit it with the post-offices, in order that they may receive interest and be relieved from paying taxes on it. To meet this governmental competition the banks themselves must offer their depositors interest, though they can not, of course, offer them a tax exemption. If the interest which the banks will be compelled to pay to their depositors fell only on the banks, and through them on their stockholders, the case might not appeal so strongly to our sympathy, because his dividends will still leave the average stockholder an ample income to provide for his family and himself; but, sir, every man who knows anything about such matters knows that the banks will simply transfer the interest which they must pay on deposits to the men who borrow those deposits. If any man doubts this, let him examine the very provisions of this bill, and he will find that it is based upon the supposition that it is just and proper to do that. The Government pays its depositor 2 per cent on his money, but no man would be so rash as to suppose that this bill could pass either branch of Congress if it required the Government to deposit the money on which it was paying 2 per cent without requiring the bank with which it must redeposit it to pay at least an equal amount. As a matter of fact, this bill provides that the Government shall pay its depositors at the rate of 2 per cent, and then requires that the banks shall pay it interest at the rate of not less than 2¼ per cent on that same money.

Now, if the Government deems it necessary and just to collect from the banks the interest which it has paid its depositors, is it not perfectly obvious that the banks will deem it just as necessary to collect from the men who borrow that money the interest which they have paid the Government? But, sir, the evil will not stop there. The banks will not only add the interest which they have paid on the money which the Government has left with them, but they will naturally apply the same rule to the deposits made directly with them, and on which the competition of the Government will compel them to pay an interest. The result of all this must be that the enterprising and industrious men of the United States who are employing the money of this country to the country's great advantage must bear an additional burden in order that a few men whose money would otherwise be kept in idleness may have their current interest. The last men in this country who are entitled to levy tribute upon those who are building up our waste places, developing our national resources, and cultivating our farms, are those who would keep their money idle rather than trust themselves to use it.

Not only, Mr. President, does this bill assume a power in Congress to exempt the money of a citizen from taxation by the State, county, and municipality in which he lives, but there is another provision in it even more startling than that. It provides that the wife may open an account with the postmaster, and that it shall be free from her husband's control. Not content to stop with interfering with the State's power to tax its own people, you have gone further and propose to suspend the state law which regulates the relation of husband and wife. Whether or not the wife's property shall be subject to the husband's control is purely a matter of domestic policy which each State has a right to decide for itself, and the Federal Government is entirely powerless to clothe the wife's property with immunity from the husband's control which he possesses under the constitution and statutes of a State. In its wisdom a State may believe that it is conducive to its highest welfare and will better preserve the peace of its homes for the husband to control all the property of the family, and any State which so believes has a full and perfect right to so decree; but this bill provides that if a wife can reach the post-office and deposit her money with the postmaster she can laugh in her husband's face and defy the authority which the State, in a lawful exercise of its authority, has conferred on him. This section of your bill affords another illustration of the class of men for whom you deem it your duty to legislate. This class, like those who can not attend to their business, is insignificant in number and unworthy of legislative attention. The only man who would be restrained by this provision of your law is some miserable creature who would strip his wife of her pin money, and that kind can well be left to the police regulations of the several States.

Mr. President, there are many other particular objections to this bill, but I forbear to consider them, because I have already taxed the patience of the Senate long enough. It has indulged me at length and with its courteous attention so often that I shall not trespass further upon its time this afternoon. In closing, I only beg leave to say that I perfectly understand that the appeal which I have made on behalf of the Constitution, and on behalf of the fundamental principles of good government, are all in vain. I understand, however, that I do not appeal to them more vainly here than I would elsewhere, because the public mind has become infected with a distemper which frets under every limitation upon its power. The people, even more than their Senators and Representatives, jeer at those of us who invoke the Constitution, and they applaud the men who scoff at it as progressive statesmen; but I warn you here and now, that if, in obedience to a public clamor, you violate the Constitution to-day, you will not be heard to plead it against your successful rivals to-morrow. The Constitution must be obeyed at all times and in all things, or else the day will come when it will not be obeyed at any time or in anything. A written constitution which is not religiously obeyed is worse than no constitution at all, and it is certain to become what a Greek philosopher once said all written constitutions are—a mere network which ensnares the weak but through which the strong break with impunity. I do not, sir, believe in a written constitution because I reverence the wisdom of the dead, but I believe in it because I fear the power of the living. I am not willing to trust you, nor am I willing to be trusted by you, to legislate upon the great and inalienable rights of freemen except within the limits of a written constitution; and I demand that those who speak and act for me shall live up to it in the exactness of its letter and in the fullness of its spirit. If you set it aside in order that you may do something which you want done, what right have you to resist your adversaries when they attempt to set it aside in order to do something which they think ought to be done? Do you imagine that you can deny its protection to others and yet enjoy its protection yourself? Others may think that, Mr. President, but I do not.

But, sir, intense as my convictions are upon this subject, I realize that I am out of harmony with the spirit of my time; and I am sometimes almost persuaded that I am living in an age and attempting to do a work for which my opinions totally unfit me. If I could have lived fifty years ago I might not have persuaded the majority to accept my views, but I could never have provoked a controversy with my political associates over them. I hope and believe that such a time will come again, because the American people must soon understand that they are governed too much. If they shall reach that conclusion before paternalism has done its deadly work, then we shall have a revival of that old faith in the man and that old distrust of the Government. We shall learn ourselves, and we shall teach our children, to believe that the Constitution created the Union, and that neither can survive the other. If we destroy the one, we can not save the other; and if we save the one, we can not destroy the other.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, at the proper time I shall ask the Senate to consider the following amendment to the bill before the Senate. It is to strike out all after the enacting clause of Senate bill 5876 and to insert:

From and after the passage of this act, the Comptroller of the Currency shall set apart the annual tax on the circulation of the national banking associations of the United States as a special fund to be designated the "Bank depositors' guaranty fund," to be used by the Comptroller for the immediate payment of the depositors of any national bank failing after the passage of this act. The net liquidated assets of any national bank, which the Comptroller of the Currency takes charge for the purpose of liquidation, shall be deposited to the credit of the "Bank depositors' guaranty fund" to the extent required to reimburse such fund any moneys advanced by such fund for the payment of the depositors of such bank. No deposit under contract, either directly or indirectly, to bear interest in excess of 4 per cent per annum on time deposit, or, in excess of 2 per cent per annum on current account, shall be included in the insurance provided by this act, and no such deposit shall be paid out of the "Bank depositors' guaranty fund."

That any state bank or trust company may have its deposits guaranteed by the "Bank depositors' guaranty fund" upon equitable returns to be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency and approved by the President of the United States.

Mr. President, to-morrow, after the morning business, if it shall suit the convenience of the Senate, I should like to be heard in regard to this matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma desire to have the amendment printed and lie on the table?

Mr. OWEN. I desire to have it printed and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be entered, if there be no objection. It is entered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by M. C. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on February 24, 1910, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 821. An act to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the district of Maryland; and

S. 1043. An act providing for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the northern judicial district of the State of Ohio, and an additional district judge in and for the southern judicial district of the State of Ohio.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

H. R. 16367. An act to repeal section 860 of the Revised Statutes;

H. R. 18594. An act to detach the counties of Genesee and Shiawassee from the northern division of the eastern judicial district of Michigan and attach them to the southern division of the eastern judicial district of Michigan;

H. R. 20575. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, as amended by an act approved February 5, 1903, and as further amended by an act approved June 15, 1906; and

H. R. 20835. An act authorizing the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico to assign the said judges to the several judicial districts of the Territory.

H. R. 17263. An act to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases," approved April 22, 1908, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

LAND NEAR CONNECTICUT AVENUE BRIDGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (S. 4617) to acquire land in the vicinity of the Connecticut Avenue Bridge for the extension of certain streets, returned from the House of Representatives in compliance with the request of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the votes whereby the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, be reconsidered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

SAFETY OF EMPLOYEES UPON RAILROADS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5702) to supplement an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads," and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill and agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. ELKINS, Mr. CRANE, and Mr. TAYLOR the conferees on the part of the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I report back from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 18162) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and I submit a report (No. 279) thereon.

I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill to-morrow after the routine morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it only fair to say to the Senator from Iowa that inasmuch as the agricultural appropriation bill has just come into the Senate, and will not be printed and subject to inspection until to-morrow, we would want more time in which to consider it and examine it than we would have if it should be taken up to-morrow. I would not want to have it understood by the Senator that there would be no objection to the bill being taken up to-morrow.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If it is not convenient for the Senator to go on with the bill to-morrow, of course I shall not insist upon it.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the postal savings-bank bill has now been discussed for a considerable length of time. After interviewing a number of Senators I feel warranted in asking that a day be fixed for a vote on the bill and all pending amendments. I desire that the time shall be amply sufficient to allow full consideration of amendments and the submission of any remarks Senators may desire to make.

I am constantly advised by Senators of their desire to be present when the bill is finally voted upon, and I know of no means by which notice can be given save by the fixing of a date.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up on Monday next, immediately after the close of the morning business, and that its consideration, together with such amendments as may be pending or offered, shall be continued, and that a final vote shall be taken on the bill and amendments before adjournment on that day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. May the Chair call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact that at the request of the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] an order was entered for the consideration of Senate bill 3360 on that day?

Mr. CARTER. I was not advised of that procedure. I will then change the day to Tuesday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That would be Tuesday, March 1.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have, I think, as great a desire as the Senator from Montana to see a speedy disposition of this bill. However, it will be impossible for me to be here either Monday or Tuesday, and I hope the time mentioned for taking up the bill and its consideration will be postponed until Thursday. I do not rise to make objection to the request of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, it was impossible to hear the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I asked the Senator from Montana to name Thursday instead of Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. CARTER. In view of the condition to which the Senator from Iowa refers, I will substitute Thursday for Tuesday in the request I make.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, before unanimous consent is given I desire to state, in view of the fact that the agricultural appropriation bill has come in to-day and notice has been given that it will be taken up at a very early time for consideration, that we can not very well fix a time to-day for taking a vote upon the postal savings-bank bill. The agricultural appropriation bill will probably occupy the attention of the Senate for several days. I think that at the last Congress that bill was under consideration for about one week or perhaps longer.

In view of that fact, we do not desire to foreclose the consideration of the postal savings-bank bill to the end of a certain day, with the possibility that the entire intervening time may be occupied by the consideration of an appropriation bill having the right of way as it will. When the appropriation bill is taken up under the rules of this body it will occupy the time, and we will want it to occupy the time, because it is one of the most important bills that comes before us. Therefore, I think we had better not at this time, in view of that fact, undertake to fix a time to vote upon the postal savings-bank bill.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I need scarcely suggest to the Senator from Idaho that under the custom of the Senate and its rules any bill may be considered at any time any Senator has a desire to submit remarks, and amendments may be offered at any time. The devotion of Thursday entire to the bill and amendments would certainly, in view of the time heretofore spent in its consideration, be quite adequate, I think.

I sincerely hope that no objection will be urged. I readily understand that if appropriation bills are to be considered as an adequate reason for denying unanimous consent, we shall not be able to reach a vote on this bill during the session. I have no doubt that every Senator here desires to have the postal savings bill finally disposed of at an early day, the Senator from Idaho included.

In view of our custom which permits a Senator at any time to submit observations upon any bill that is pending, no inconvenience will be suffered by fixing a day, because, with the agricultural appropriation bill or any other bill pending, I know of a number of Senators who, regardless of what may be pending at the time, contemplate addressing the Senate to-morrow, and possibly the day following, on the postal savings bill. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has given notice that immediately after the close of the morning business to-morrow he will address the Senate on a certain amendment which he has proposed.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I do not want the Senate to gain the impression that I desire the agricultural appropriation bill to delay the fixing of a time to vote on the postal savings bill. I would certainly be willing to frame my suggestion as to the appropriation bill so as not to interfere with anybody's desire to address the Senate upon the postal savings bill. I think I may assure the Senate for the committee that they would not desire the bill used to postpone for a minute the final vote on the postal savings bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, under that statement and existing conditions, I shall not oppose the fixing of one week from to-day, which is, I understand, the date named by the Senator from Montana as the day at the close of which a vote may be taken on the postal savings bill. This is with the understanding as suggested by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I am willing to vote on the postal savings bill now. I do not care anything about any speeches that are to be made upon it and I have no desire to postpone the final passage of the bill, if it is to pass, and I believe it will. But it would have been, I think, my duty to object to the fixing of a day but for the assurance given by the honorable chairman of the Agricultural Committee that that bill will give way to anyone who wants to address the Senate on the pending bill.

I do not wish, however, to have it understood that this is to be an order that will exclude anyone who desires to speak upon this subject. There are some Senators, I understand, on this side who would like to speak. I am not one of that number.

If the Senator from Montana will consent that this agreement shall give way in order to make it possible for anyone to speak who desires to do so, I have no objection to fixing a week from to-day, with the understanding from the Senator from Iowa that the agricultural appropriation bill will give way, but I could not consent to an order that would exclude anybody from speaking on this question; it is too momentous a one and affects too many people. Some men are taking a good deal of responsibility with their constituents on both sides of the House. I am willing, however, for next Thursday, a week from to-day, to be fixed, under the conditions that have been proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana what proposal he intends to make regarding the time on the last day. The Senator is probably aware that upon that day there will be quite a number who will wish to speak briefly. Would it not be advisable to have a time limit upon that day, to take up the amendments seriatim and dispose of them, instead of pursuing the practice that is often pursued of allowing the amendments to come up at the close of the debate and at the close of the day?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, my understanding is that all Senators desiring to address the Senate at any length on the merits of the bill will do so prior to next Thursday. The request for unanimous consent is, as will be stated by the Secretary, in substance, that immediately after the close of morning business on Thursday the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the postal savings-bank bill, and all amendments then pending or to be offered, and that a final vote shall be taken on the amendments and the bill before adjournment on that day. I presume if any attempt were made to specify the period of time or to invoke any rule, difficulty would be encountered in getting the unanimous consent.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand, then, that hereafter the suggestion may be made as to a limitation of time on Thursday, so as to permit those who wish to speak to have the opportunity.

Mr. CARTER. That, I presume, will be arranged later if it is the desire of Senators to bring it forward. I would much prefer not interjecting that question at this time. I doubt very much if any Senator will want to address the Senate at length on Thursday.

Mr. MONEY. I shall have to object to any arrangement by which anybody is limited. I have just heard of two or three Senators on this side who want to speak, and they may not be ready before next Thursday. I will ask the Senator from Montana if it would not suit his convenience to take the bill up on Thursday and continue the discussion until we get to a vote? That would answer his purpose. We might not conclude it on Thursday, but it can be continued as the unfinished business until it is voted upon finally, giving then every Senator an opportunity to express himself who desires to do so.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Mississippi realizes that to continue the bill as the unfinished business would be of little gain. My desire is that all Senators wishing to vote on the bill shall have an opportunity to do so, and that notice be given somewhat in advance of a definite day or time when the vote will be taken.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will suggest that we have never heretofore had any difficulty, during the day upon which a bill is to be voted upon, of limiting the speeches, if it becomes a necessity. I think we had better not undertake to do that in advance, but undoubtedly it can be done on the day upon which the bill is to be voted on.

Mr. MONEY. The remark I made was in view of the fact that I have just been apprised that some gentlemen want to speak on this side, and one at least will not be prepared to do so until Thursday on account of other engagements. I do not propose, for one, to consent to an arrangement that would deprive Senators of the liberty of a full expression on this subject on account of the great responsibility which belongs to everyone who speaks or votes on it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should think there would be abundant opportunity for every Senator to speak at length on Thursday.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And yet, Mr. President, I submit that under the suggestion made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] it would be entirely possible, if Thursday is fixed as the day for the final conclusion of the vote on this subject, for a single speaker, or two or three speakers, to take up the entire time. In that view, it seems to be necessary, if the time for the vote is to be fixed, that for at least three or four hours prior to that there should be an opportunity given to Senators to discuss the various amendments as they come up.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think it is clear that we can remain in session or, if need be, take a recess, so as to allow every Senator an opportunity to address the Senate on Thursday without any difficulty.

Mr. MONEY. That would be perfectly satisfactory, I think.

Mr. BACON. The Senator means take a recess until the next day?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Make it the same legislative day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]?

Mr. BACON. I understand no hour is fixed, but simply the day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct. The Chair hears no objection to the request. The Secretary will state the request, so that there may be no possible misunderstanding.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] asks unanimous consent that on Thursday, March 3, next, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories, and so forth, and that a vote will be had upon all amendments pending or to be offered and on the bill itself before adjournment on that day.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Montana, in view of a suggestion which he made privately to some of us, that the language "legislative day" be used.

Mr. CARTER. Very well, Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Montana having made the suggestion, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]——

Mr. CARTER. I accept that suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The word "legislative" will be inserted before "day."

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to complete the statement I was going to make in order that it may appear in the RECORD. The Senator from Montana having suggested, in view of a statement made by the Senator from Mississippi, that, if necessary, a recess would be taken, the legislative day being preserved, and, if necessary, going over to the next day, every Senator having the opportunity to be heard.

Mr. CARTER. That will be done if it can be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The change will be made, and the word "legislative" will be inserted before the word "day" in the agreement.

ADDRESS OF SENATOR GORDON.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I am informed that the senatorial deadlock in Mississippi has been broken and that we shall soon have Mr. Leroy Percy to take my place in the Senate. As I am about to retire from the Senate, I wish to express my feelings and sentiments in regard to my brief experience here. I did not expect to-day to make a speech, notwithstanding I found after I got into the Senate Chamber that some of the newspapers had stated I would do so. I wish you to understand that I am not making a set speech, and I have not written any such poetry as that ascribed to me by the newspapers this morning. [Laughter.]

I am guilty of one little act of poetry. I published a little book, which I have got hid away in the desk here and which I am going to give to the President of the Senate when I get through here, and probably he will have a worse opinion of me then than he had before. [Laughter.]

I will tell you how I came to be a United States Senator. I started when I was 5 years old. It took me a long while to get here, and I found it a very rugged road to travel; but I did get here. When I was a little chap about 5 years of age—I will tell you a story, and you may tell your children, and you old fellows may tell your grandchildren—I received as a present something like a map on pasteboard. It had this great Capitol as a picture at the top of it and squares with numbers on them. Those numbers represented all the passions that had escaped from Pandora's box. That map had marked on it all the temptations that would befall a youth growing up. It had a little teetotem, as it was called, in octagon shape, and it had numbers on it up to 8, on which to spin. My mother used to take me to her side.

If you should spin the teetotem and it went over the mark and got on a bad place in the square, that would be one of the bad passions; but if it escaped all those, and the teetotem got on the great Capitol of the United States, you would be in the United States Senate. I saw a great big fellow sitting up there in that stand. I wanted to know of ma if I would get there; and, God helping me, I got there yesterday. [Laughter.] She told me that if I would lead a clean life and form no bad habits I would be sure to get there. She never told a story in her life, and so I knew it would come true. In all my life, Senators, that thing has stuck to me, and every time I wanted to do wrong I saw one of those passions on that board, and that board has stood before my eyes from that day until to-day, though I have never made it public until now. I thought this was the place to do it.

Now, I wish to talk to you about our affairs in Mississippi, and so forth. I am a peculiar sort of a genius—not much of a genius, either—but I have got about a thimble full of common sense that I use occasionally, and I want to use it now to the best advantage.

I have had a varied life. I was born a multimillionaire, very unhappily, too, for I never saw one of them that was happy yet, and I never was happy myself until I got rid of my millions. The largest portion of them went to feed a large number of slaves that I unfortunately inherited and the rest I spent on my friends, like a gentleman should, and got rid of the incumbrance. [Laughter.]

I have been listening to speeches here very carefully, and the more I heard of the speeches the sorrier I felt for the millionaires. Thank God, I am not one any more. [Laughter.]

I heard the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] the other day make a speech in which he abused Rockefeller. If there is a man in the United States that I am sorry for, it is Rockefeller. [Laughter.] I can not help sympathizing with a fellow that everybody is "cussing," and I never could see what they "cussed" him for unless because he had more money than anybody else. I do not think that is a fault, but it is a misfortune. I am sorry for a man in his condition, when he can not go out on the street and have even his little grandchildren walk in sight of him without threats that they will kill his little babes. I know the old fellow loves those children better than all the gold in his vaults; and he would not be a human being if he did not.

I am now going to say something that is unpopular in my section of the country. If I were an office seeker, I might be tempted to do wrong, but I always did say before my people what I thought was right. I think that Mr. Rockefeller is a good man, and I am going to think so until somebody shows me that he has done wrong. I see his employees very often, and I never saw one of them who did not speak well of him. I am told that he never had a strike among his employees. I am told another thing, that he has given more millions—I do not think much of him for that, because he had more than he had any use for; but he has given more of them—to the poor, to charity, to the churches, to education, and to build hospitals all over the country where they are needed for his employees, where they can go when they are sick and be cared for, than has any other man. If anybody in the United States does not like that let them put it in their pipes and smoke it. [Laughter.] I have said it.

If my friend from Arkansas is opposed to what I call prosperity, I would like for Mr. Rockefeller to come down and run his pipes through Mississippi. He can go all over my land. [Laughter.] We shall be glad to have him. I used to pay 40 cents a gallon for oil to be burnt in my lamps. We are a little better off now, we are independent, because we have got electric lights, but we paid 40 cents a gallon for oil, and now we can get it for 10 cents a gallon. I do not know whether Mr. Rockefeller is the cause of the price coming down to 10 cents, but I think it will be that way in Arkansas if they get the conveniences that this pipe business proposes to give them, and I intend to vote for the pipes. That is all there is to it. [Laughter.]

Well, I want you to understand that I am a plain, blunt, old confederate soldier. I wore the gray and I fought and bled, but I did not die, though I skedaddled frequently. [Laughter.] You understand that word "skedaddled." These old soldiers will understand it.

I had the honor during my service to capture some very prominent men in the northern army; among them was General Coburn, of Indianapolis, Ind. I captured one great, big man, who afterwards became General Shafter. He was then a major in the Nineteenth Michigan. He was a very poor shot, for I advanced on him with my saber, and he shot at me five times and never touched me. [Laughter.]

Now, I will tell another story. That fellow Shafter gave me an awful scare. When I approached him he handed me his pistol and said: "You are welcome to it, but it will do you no good, as I have shot all the cartridges away; but over at the stockade near Franklin, Tenn., I have a valise that has got a thousand cartridges in it, and you are welcome to those, if you will go after them." I said: "Thank you for the pistol; I will go after the cartridges."

In a few weeks later with Forrest I went to Brentwood Station, captured the fort, and got the cartridges, but I never used them. I never fired a shot during the war. [Laughter.] That is a fact. I had just about enough to do to look after the men that I had engaged. That is the kind of a soldier I was. I told the other fellows to do the fighting. A great many of them stayed at home, and if I had been as smart as they were, I might have done the same. [Laughter.]

When the confederate soldier and the Union soldier—we called them "Yanks" in that day, and they called us "Johnnies"—met they were always friendly. General Coburn asked permission of General Cheatham and General Polk to present me his sword for kindnesses extended to him when he was a prisoner of war. I carried him from near Franklin to Tullahoma, Tenn., and that sword was presented to me at Tullahoma. I sent it home with the petition that I had, with the signatures of General Cheatham and General Polk, and I have it yet; and when Grierson made his raid through my country and went by my father's house, my wife presented that order to his adjutant, and they gave us a guard and protected the house.

Another time a gentleman, who is living yet, by the name of Captain Brown, of the Seventh Illinois, and I had a little engagement. That Seventh Illinois was the meanest regiment I ever saw, for it never wanted to quit fighting. [Laughter.] The Seventh Illinois and the Second Iowa were the worst men I had to fight; but I am glad when I see them alive to-day. When we meet, we shake hands; we are the best of friends, and Captain Brown of the Seventh Illinois and I have kept up a correspondence ever since the war. He is living at Leon, Iowa, now; and if you think I am not telling the fact you can call on him and prove it. As I have said, he is still living, and I hope he will live a hundred years, and that I will live to see him decently buried. [Laughter.]

Now, gentleman, I did not get up here just to make you laugh. I want to tell you something that will not make you laugh. Down in Mississippi where I live, when I go home and go to my bed to sleep and dream sweet dreams of the hours I have spent here in the Senate, I sleep with the sword of Damocles hanging over my head. We have a problem to settle there that I want you to help me settle. I do not ask you to agree with me, but I ask you to talk with me and listen to what I have to say, and, in kindness and friendship, I want to see Mason and Dixon's line obliterated from the map of the United States, and on it the words written "Our country." [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

I am tired of sectionalism. God knows I got enough of it fighting. I do not want any more of it. I do not want to hear any speech in the Senate or anywhere else that stirs up strife between the old soldiers or citizens who are not in the army.

I do want to bring about peace. I am an old confederate; you are old veterans, perhaps. We disagreed, and you were the victors; but we still think our generals were good men and our people were good people; and we do not dispute that yours were just as good as ours. Our people down South are not quarreling over these things at all. We have a few blab-mouthed fellows that always want to make a fuss, but they are not even worth "cussing." [Laughter.] So I will not use any invectives against them. We have them down South; but they are not my sort, and I have got more influence with the people than they have. I talk with them as I talk to you. I tell them the truth and the facts, and I tell them we have friends here, but they do not see things as we do.

We want you to think well of us, and there is no use of calling us traitors. They used to call George Washington a rebel and a traitor, but we do not think so ourselves; and I do not think any of us fellows were traitors, while we may have been rebels. I do not deny that. We thought we ought to fight for our States, and we disagreed just on a little section in the Constitution—a very small thing to fight about, but we made an awful big fuss when we got at it. [Laughter.]

Now, nobody can take away the glories of either side. A man had as well attempt to scale the ramparts of Jehovah and pluck from heaven's diadem God's brightest star as to snatch the laurel from the brow of the conqueror or the conquered that stood under the apple tree of Appomattox. They go together; they are all famous; and there were good men on all sides. They disagreed, and they fought for it; but when one side conquered and the other was conquered, we took our oaths of allegiance, and I can hold up my hand before high heaven and before this Senate to-day and say I have never violated that oath that I took to be a good citizen of the United States, and I never knew of a soldier of the confederacy violating that obligation.

This is my father's house. I am proud to be in it. I am proud to be associated to-day with the men whom I see around me. I have read the papers and I have heard you all abused and censured, but I find that this is the finest working body of men with whom I have ever been associated. I had no idea of the amount of work that was incumbent upon a man who occupied a seat in this Senate. If he does his duty, he has a great amount of labor to perform for the benefit of his country—of our country. I know no North, no South, no East, no West; but love my country, every part the best.

I love Mississippi because it is my home. A man always loves his home a little more than any other place. I love the particular spot where I live better than any other spot, and you do the same. We have there ties of friendship and love and everything that we have not anywhere else.

I come to you to talk of friendship and of love for one another. My religion is the eleventh commandment of Christ, when He said, "A new commandment I give unto you; that ye love one another." That is what I want to bring about here; that is my object in standing here to-day to talk to you as I do. I want to implant in you, just as it is in my heart, a growing love for the country I live in and the people I live with. I live with you all; you are not divided from me by Mason and Dixon's line, isothermal lines, or any other plagued lines. [Laughter.] I want to wipe out all lines. That is my desire.

I want to see you join me in taking away the bayonets that are on those guns you sent down there to a race of people who came out of a jungle and are only partially civilized. We can not civilize them in half a century. We were not civilized in a thousand years as we are to-day.

We do not want to hurt the negro. We all love the negro. I want to read you here a little sentiment of mine. I have got a little book here, and I want to read from it and show you just how we feel toward the negro. This is my poetry, but I will not bore you with much of it [laughter], and, understand, I am not advertising it either; it is not on the market yet. [Laughter.]

THE OLD BLACK MAMMY.

'Tis easy to wander off from my theme
When traveling over the ground;
Thro' evergreen pastures across the bright stream
When in fancy I wander around,
And see in the picture which never grows older
Tho' age chills the blood which never grows colder.

In fancy I see those good negroes again
I loved in the days long ago,
As they worked in the fields of cotton and grain
And sung as they chopped with the hoe;
I can never forget, wherever I roam,
The scenes of my childhood and home.

The dear old black mammy, so gentle and tender,
So faithful and true to her trust—
I loved her so well I dared not offend her;
She is gone, yet I honor her dust.
From the wells of my heart arise tears of regret;
Tho' she sleeps 'neath the sod, I can never forget.

She was lovely to me in her colored bandanna
With which she turbaned her head;
Her songs were far sweeter than flute or piano
As she put me to sleep in my bed;
Her soft crooning voice I can never forget,
Like an angel in dreams, she comes to me yet.

Those are our sentiments. [Applause.] I think my friend BAILEY will testify to that. Excuse me for calling your name, Senator——

Mr. BAILEY. That is all right.

Mr. GORDON. I am not familiar here. They call me "Jim" down at home, and I hardly recognize myself when I am called by any other name. [Laughter.]

I want to read another little verse here to you fellows who do not love us:

We make our own sorrows, the evils of fate,
When we take in our hearts malice, envy, and hate.
There is good in the world, and we may be sure
That a heart full of love will keep the soul pure.
When we cross Death's dark river and reach the bright shore
Beloved ones will greet us and welcome us o'er.
And while it is given to dwell on this earth,
No matter where may be the land of our birth,
Our duty to God is to do all we can,
Be true to our country, love our fellow-man.

Those were my sentiments long before I came here or thought of coming here.

Now, gentlemen of the Senate, I have made these few remarks. I hope you will take them in, and I hope you will give consideration to them. I hope you will believe I am telling nothing but the truth; and I want to say in kindness and with regard for the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that I want him to come down South and come to my cottage on the prairie and I will show him a little of the southern life. When we get through we will come back here and we will walk into Statuary Hall, and what will I say to him? I will say, "Help me persuade the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] to take the Lew Wallace statue out of here and hide it away in some river or pond where it never can be seen any more, and build him a statue worthy of so great a man as Lew Wallace." [Laughter.] I have admired him ever since I read Ben Hur and ever since I heard of his getting a little out of temper at the battle of Shiloh. I reckon he must have had a good deal of human nature in him. He is a man that I was very fond of, and I am fond of his memory. I want to see him have a grand statue, and I will come up here and see them set it up. After they do that, with the Senator from Idaho, after he has seen the South through my spectacles—and I will lend them to him on that occasion—I want to come back here and stand before Grant's statue and stand before Lee's statue, and I will pull off my hat and hurrah for Grant, and, I think, he will holler, "Lee was a pretty good fellow," and he will say, "Hurrah for Lee!" That is the kind of feeling I want to cultivate with him. [Laughter.]

I want you all to understand that what I say to the Senator from Idaho I say with no feeling in my heart against him. No; I love him. I love everybody. I am a happy man. I never let hate get into my heart, so as to make me unhappy. That is the reason I have lived and kept young, and retained my youth and beauty while you have gotten old and ugly—some of you. [Laughter.] I have not lost my hair yet; but it is falling out, and I am going to leave here to keep from losing it altogether. I am going to leave here, for many of you have got all the hair off your heads, and I think I had better go home. [Laughter.]

Well, Senators, I am very glad that there is such a good man coming from Mississippi to take my place without the pleasure of having to kick me out.

Senators, I know I am infringing on your time. I did not intend to say as much as I have said, but I do hope I have said something to you that you will remember and ponder over; and when the time comes that you think I told the truth, I want you to write to me and say, "Well, GORDON, old fellow, we will help you." That is what we want—help. I want your capitalists to come down to Mississippi, and we will give them the right hand of fellowship, because we want to get your money. [Laughter.] We want you to erect our factories, build our railroads, and do everything else. We will give you all the opportunities you want, and we will be there with you, whether you run an oil machine or any other sort of a machine. [Laughter.] I do not care whether it is Mr. Rockefeller or Mr. Anybody Else, just so he has what we have not—the money to build up the State.

I thank you, gentlemen, for your attention.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I have heard a great many farewell addresses in my life; I read the most famous of them on Washington's Birthday, the 22d of this month; but this is the most unique contribution to literature of this character which any of us has ever heard. It will live in the records of the Senate as probably the most remarkable address either of a new Senator coming in or of an old one going out that has ever been delivered. Its patriotism and good-fellowship, broad mindedness, charity, and humor will remain among the best recollections of those who heard it. I believe I express the sentiment of every one of the colleagues of our departing friend when I say that we deeply regret his going, and that no matter how wonderful a genius or great a statesman succeeds him he can never be Senator GORDON, of Mississippi. [Applause.]

GAMBLING IN FUTURES.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish, by unanimous consent, to present the following letter:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

WARM SPRINGS HOTEL,
Warm Springs, Ga., February 21, 1910.

Hon. W. C. ADAMSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR ADAMSON: As the fight against the New York Cotton Exchange and gambling in agricultural products seems to have made some headway, allow me to say that I believe if Congress will adopt such measures as will put a stop to this gambling and thereby kill the cotton exchange, it will have accomplished for the South a result which will do more for the good and prosperity of its people than anything else which could be done.

I do not believe that the cotton exchange accomplishes any good result whatever to the cotton producer or the manufacturer, but simply exists for the good of the members of the exchange, enabling them and their associates to live in luxury on the products of other people, as is the case of other gamblers who are allowed to run their games. The only practical difference being that the player against the game in this case never sees the cards dealt, and that the rake off all goes away from home. And besides, this gambling is more tempting because it can be done by men who would never risk the chance of being found out as players against a faro game at home.

As to the information which the exchange professes to furnish for the good of the producers and manufacturers, these get it secondhanded after the exchange members have had an opportunity to discount its effect. In my judgment, it would be much better for the cotton producers, manufacturers, and legitimate or spot-cotton buyers to form a bureau of information for themselves, the reports of which giving information as to the planting, cultivation, and general conditions as the crop progressed would be much more reliable and valuable to these parties interested than any information now coming through the exchange or any of its members.

Moreover, the government reports are to be had for a basis to regulate estimates of the crop on and a much sounder one than those furnished by the exchange.

We know that the prices for future contracts are not now on a parity with the price for spot cotton, and that this difference is only because the former are made in the transaction of a gamble and it is not expected that actual delivery of any cotton will be made.

If you have time please let me hear from you on this.

Yours, truly,

CHAS. L. DAVIS.

SAFETY OF TRAVEL ON RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 5702) to supplement an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads," with Senate amendments, which were read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees: Mr. MANN, Mr. WANGER, and Mr. ADAMSON.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill, H. R. 21419.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, I ask at the close of the session at half past 5 a recess be taken until 8 o'clock, and the evening session to be continued this evening until 11 o'clock for general debate on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess at half past 5 o'clock until 8, and that the evening session continue until 11, at which time the House shall stand adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not have any objection——

Mr. WEEKS. The evening session to be for general debate only.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is what I wanted to know.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts give his attention? The evening session is for general debate only. The Chair will submit the request for unanimous consent, that if the House is in Committee of the Whole, the gentleman's request is that the Committee of the Whole take a recess at half past 5 until 8 o'clock, and after the recess continue in session until 11 o'clock, when the committee will rise and the House by virtue of this agreement will stand adjourned?

Mr. WEEKS. I make that request of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 24149, the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. WEEKS. It is not my purpose to detain the committee with any extended remarks at this time, preferring to explain in detail, during the reading of the bill, such matters as there may be a question about. There are some general observations, however, which may be appropriate in presenting the bill. No governmental department furnishes such a complete barometer of business conditions as does the Post-Office Department. If business is good, it follows with absolute certainty that the post-office receipts will be large. If, on the contrary, business is poor, the receipts of the post-office decline in the same ratio for this reason. Unless the department can correctly prognosticate future business conditions, no accurate estimate can be made of the probable revenues, but for a ten-year period the result may be pretty accurately estimated. Except in two such periods during the one hundred and ten years' life of this department the growth has been very nearly, if not quite, 100 per cent. It was that in the ten-year period ending June 30, 1909, and the rate since that date, owing to a revival in business, has been rather more than 10 per cent, so that the Member now serving his first term who remains in Congress as long as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, General BINGHAM, who was once chairman of this committee, or the Speaker, who saw his early service on it, and who, by the way, was the author of the present method of determining the rate to be paid for transportation, will be likely to see, if postal rates are not changed, a department with receipts nearly as large as the present expenses of the Government and an army of employees at least twice as large as any military force ever assembled. Such growth must necessarily mean inequalities in service, in the pay of employees, in the number of employees required at different points, and the almost certainty that changes of method and policy will frequently be delayed after conditions have indicated their necessity. It develops the condition which was referred to by the gentleman from Kansas the other day, which he spoke of as curiosities in the postal service. Such curiosities do exist, and many more could have been instanced.

The service labors under the disadvantage of not retaining at its head any Postmaster-General for a long enough period to enable him to become thoroughly acquainted with the service—I am now speaking impersonally—while in the assistants' positions the salaries paid do not generally command the services of those rare men, sometimes met in civil life, who have a genius for organization and administration, and the appointee has not in any case technical knowledge, which can only be acquired after a considerable term of service. On the other hand, if promotions are made from those in the service, while expert knowledge is obtained, lack of experience in modern business may prevent the officer from developing the best qualities of an executive. I do not, of course, refer to the present officers of the department, or, indeed, to any others, and am simply calling attention to the system and the natural results obtained from it.

I venture to say that if any Member of this House were entirely responsible for the business management of the Post-Office Department he would look about to find one of those unusual men in civil life who is an expert organizer and a model administrator to conduct the transportation business of the department. He would pay such a man whatever was necessary to obtain his services, whether it be $10,000 or $50,000 or more annually. Of course it is impossible, under usual conditions, for us to pay such salaries.

It would probably be impossible to pay more than is paid to the head of the department, the Postmaster-General, though I have not any doubt that if the right man could be found he would be worth to the Government any reasonable salary which might be paid him. The department has grown so rapidly that its organization in many respects is not up to date. For instance, there is a divisional organization of the Railway Mail Service, a divisional organization of the salary and allowance division, a divisional organization of the inspecting service, but there is no divisional organization of other branches of the service.

Nobody would attempt to run a great railway company in such a way that a section boss must report to the president of the road or to the central office. He would report to his divisional superintendent. The Post-Office Department, when it has a suitable organization, will be organized along divisional lines. Postmasters will report to their divisional superintendents, and they will make requisitions on their divisional superintendents.

I have suggested only one or two of the many criticisms that I have in mind. I hope that in another bill the attempt will be made to incorporate these criticisms in some changes in the organization of the department; but at the same time, while we are criticising, we should do justice to the organization we have.

Considering the fact that the post-office service is in touch with every person in this country, I think the number of complaints which reach Congressmen are pretty nearly negligible. In other words, the employees of the department and the officers of the department, as individuals, have responded to a remarkable degree to the needs of the service.

The estimates made by the department have been pretty closely followed by the Post-Office Committee in making the appropriations for the ensuing years; that is not only true in the past, but it applies to the work of the committee this year.

The President, in giving instructions to the departmental officers last summer, urged that in making estimates for the year 1911 the greatest economy should be observed. All departments have followed his directions. I understand that something like $50,000,000 have been cut out of the total estimates for all of the departments. The officers of the Post-Office Department have estimated $243,672,000 instead of the $250,000,000, which would be the normal increase, for the year 1911.

The appropriation for the current year was $234,692,000. Subsequent estimates were made by the department while the Post-Office Committee was in session, by which the original estimate was reduced $1,831,000, leaving the final estimate $241,861,000, or only a little more than $7,000,000 more than the appropriation for the current year. The committee, in making its recommendations to the House, reduced this by about $2,000,000, leaving the appropriation recommended $239,812,000, or $5,119,000 more than last year.

Now, before making any comment on this and the reason for changes in recommendations, I want to call the attention of the committee to some elements which will give a definite idea of the growth and cost of the service, which seem to show that the increase in the number of employees and the appropriations therefor have been out of proportion to the increase in receipts.

Salaries of postmasters	$19,116,923.34	$26,572,936.23
Salaries of clerks	12,404,030.15	34,876,492.71
Cost of city delivery	14,671,362.39	29,868,757.95
Railway Mail Service	8,839,767.30	18,356,800.13
Rural Delivery Service	420,499.11	35,583,779.50

During these years the transportation of domestic mail by railroads and other means has increased from $45,109,936.39 in 1900 to $62,025,603.33 in 1909. These figures not only indicate the additional cost of handling the service, but represent more clearly than words could its enormous growth. Incidentally, it may be added that this growth has required the employment, as the expenditures indicate, of a vast army of additional employees, as follows:

	1900.	1909.
Railway postal clerks	8,695	16,044
Post-office clerks	14,886	31,048
City letter carriers	15,322	27,020
Rural carriers	1,276	40,499

The number of postmasters has been reduced from about 76,000 to about 60,000.

The appropriations for the department are made under five heads; that is, to five different offices, the office of the Postmaster-General and the offices of his four assistants. The appropriation for the office of the Postmaster-General includes that for the inspecting service. No change has been made in the number of inspectors provided for the year 1911 or for the pay of inspectors or for the per diem allowance for their traveling expenses. The total appropriation for the office of the Postmaster-General is $1,134,250, a decrease of $17,500; that is, decreased from the appropriation for the current year and from the department's estimates for the following year. The office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General includes the appropriations for postmasters, assistant postmasters, clerks and substitutes for clerks, letter carriers and substitutes for letter carriers.

The appropriation for the current year is $103,992,000. The Post-Office Department estimated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, $110,119,300 for this office. This amount has been reduced by the committee's recommendation to $108,549,300, a reduction of $1,570,000. In the report made by the committee the items in which these reductions have been made are indicated.

The salaries for postmasters are fixed by law, and the estimate for the year is $27,900,000. The committee recommends the estimate made by the department. The salaries for the assistant postmasters are limited by law, and the estimate made by the department is substantially followed in the recommendations made by the committee. The salaries for clerks in the first and second class post-offices are fixed by law, with the practice that Congress may increase the maximum $100 if it so wills. In making the appropriation for this service, the department estimated $34,700,000, which was reduced by the committee $800,000, leaving its recommendation, $33,900,000.

The reason for making this reduction is that it was found that there were available for appointment on the 30th of June, 1909, 973 clerks for whose appointment there was no necessity. In the appropriation bill for the current year there were provided 2,250 clerks, making a total of 3,223 clerks available for appointment this year. Up to the 1st of January the department had appointed 1,300, and it estimated that it would require for service for the balance of the year 450 clerks, which would leave available for appointment the 30th of next June, already provided for by this year's appropriation, 1,473. To that number the committee added 47, making available for the year 1911, 1,520. The number appointed during the last ten years has averaged 1,671 a year. In other words, we are not providing for the average number which have been appointed during the nine preceding years by 151.

Mr. DENBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. DENBY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts one or two questions about this. Does the eligibility of the clerks now available stand for a period of one year more?

Mr. WEEKS. It stands for two years from the time the appropriation is made.

Mr. DENBY. So that for the coming year there are 1,400 clerks available and on the list who are eligible for appointment.

Mr. WEEKS. If the department appoints only 450 clerks during the six months ending the 30th of June next, there will be 1,473 clerks carried over who will be eligible for appointment during the year 1911.

Mr. DENBY. What is the average number of vacancies occurring during the year?

Mr. WEEKS. The average appointments for the past nine years have been 1,671 annually.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The Post-Office Department informed me that in administering the last appropriation law it sometimes happened that a clerk in a presidential post-office received more pay than the assistant postmaster. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether that has been provided against?

Mr. WEEKS. It has not been provided against. The salary of an assistant postmaster is limited to one-half the salary of the postmaster. I believe it is the judgment of many men who have investigated the desirability of assistant postmasters in small second-class post-offices that there should be no assistant postmaster in those offices, and that the postmaster should do all the work; but it is contended by the department that if there were not assistant postmasters, clerks would have to be provided in their places. Now, I want to say right there that it is impossible for a legislative committee, where we are taking on employees, not by tens or twenties, but by regiments, to determine whether a definite number of employees are necessary or not. The only way we can determine what should be done is by a system of averages, and, in answer directly to the gentleman from Vermont, I will say that the point which he makes has not been corrected in this bill, and I do not think it ought to be.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question in regard to the matter of clerks?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has stated that all the clerks provided for in the current fiscal year will not be needed.

Mr. WEEKS. No.

Mr. MANN. Of course the gentleman knows, as the rest of us know, that all clerks were not provided for for the full period of a year, so that the number of clerks authorized is not as important a proposition as the money appropriated. How much increase in the appropriation for the clerks has the committee provided?

Mr. WEEKS. It has provided a sufficient appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Has it provided a sufficient appropriation to employ what is needed for the clerks already authorized?

Mr. WEEKS. It has.

Mr. MANN. Of course that is not the case with the current law.

Mr. WEEKS. The increase for this service provided in the law is $1,991,500, which would pay, if they were appointed at the usual times of year when there would probably be vacancies, 1,520 for the next year.

Mr. MANN. Very well. You have only provided for an increase—how many clerks did the gentleman say?

Mr. WEEKS. Forty-seven, I think.

Mr. MANN. Only an increase of 47 clerks in number; but you have provided a very large increase in the amount of the appropriation, so it may be possible to employ all the clerks that you have authorized.

Mr. WEEKS. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Whereas before it would not be possible to employ all the clerks for the entire fiscal year, at least under the appropriation that was made.

Mr. WEEKS. It was not possible, because it is estimated the clerks will be appointed at intervals during the year. You do not make appointments for the whole year, because the practice of the department is to appoint what are required during the year.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman understands there has been more or less criticism, and he only provides an increase of 47 clerks——

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Under a misapprehension, so far as that point is concerned, that no more clerks were, in fact, authorized to be employed than before, whereas you now propose to appropriate enough money to really employ more clerks than could have been employed proportionately before.

Mr. WEEKS. My understanding, Mr. Chairman, is that we have appropriated money enough to employ in the regular course of the practice of the department 1,520 new clerks for the year 1911.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said the amount appropriated by this bill was one million and some odd dollars more. According to my figures it is nearly $3,000,000 more.

Mr. WEEKS. For that particular item.

Mr. MANN. I mean on that item.

Mr. WEEKS. The figures I have here are $1,191,000. The gentleman is probably correct. This year the appropriation is $33,900,000. That is nearly $3,000,000 increase.

Mr. STAFFORD. The appropriation last year was $30,000,000.

Mr. GOULDEN. I understood the chairman of the committee to say that the increase was only 47 for clerks in first and second class post-offices.

Mr. WEEKS. That is correct.

Mr. GOULDEN. Then he quoted some figures about 1,500. What does that mean?

Mr. WEEKS. It means that the department estimates there will be available 1,473 clerks already provided for, whose appointment will not be necessary during this year.

Mr. GOULDEN. Can the gentleman tell us how many deaths or removals occurred in the clerk's list in first and second class offices during the past year?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think I have those figures, but it will not change the amount. It is all figured in in the estimates of the department.

Mr. GOULDEN. Can the gentleman tell us what the estimate was of the department for the increase in the clerks in the first and second class offices?

Mr. WEEKS. Their estimate for the year was $34,700,000.

Mr. GOULDEN. How many clerks to be added for the year ending June 30, 1911?

Mr. WEEKS. The first estimate was for 2,100 and the second was for 1,724.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does the gentleman think that in view of the department's estimate the 47 increase was sufficient for good, efficient service?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not any doubt about it.

Mr. GOULDEN. I think that the chairman of the committee is in error. I would certainly increase it more than the committee has done. This is my candid opinion as a business man familiar with the work done by this important department of the Government.

Mr. AUSTIN. The First Assistant Postmaster-General in the hearing before the committee requested he be allowed 2,100 additional.

Mr. WEEKS. He made that request.

Mr. AUSTIN. And at the hearing last year he stated that on account of the growth of the postal service he would require annually an additional clerical force of from 2,000 to 2,500 clerks.

Mr. WEEKS. Quite likely he made that statement.

I want to add in my answer, Mr. Chairman, what I have stated, but which ought to be repeated, that there were available for appointment 983 clerks the 1st of last July, and the department estimates now that there will be available next June 1,473 clerks whose appointment is not necessary.

Mr. MANN. To clear up a misapprehension, I think, on the part of some people, you carry in the bill 296 clerks at $600. Of course, everyone knows you have to take in a great many more clerks at $600 than the 296. Now, I suppose that is figured out by employing persons under the other items at not exceeding so much?

Mr. WEEKS. At not exceeding so much and not exceeding a certain number of clerks.

Mr. MANN. So that 296 is a limitation on the $600 clerks?

Mr. WEEKS. Not at all.

Mr. MADDEN. Why is it not?

Mr. WEEKS. It is not because there are available and carried over for another year 1,473 clerks.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman explain what he means by available?

Mr. WEEKS. I mean they were provided for in the appropriation bill for the current year, but it is not necessary that they be appointed. The service does not require them. In other words, the department has been estimating for more clerks than the service demanded. They estimated for 983 more than required in the year 1909, and they now estimate that they will have available on the 30th of June next 1,473.

Mr. MADDEN. Do I understand by that statement that the gentleman means that they have money with which to pay that many men?

Mr. WEEKS. I understand the comptroller has decided that that number is carried over for two years from the beginning of the year in which the original appropriation is made.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there an unexpended balance out of which these men can be paid?

Mr. WEEKS. They will be paid out of this year's appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not quite an answer to my question. I would like to know if there is an unexpended balance out of which they can be paid?

Mr. WEEKS. There is an appropriation of $33,900,000, sufficient to pay all clerks now in the service and 1,520 new clerks the next year.

Mr. SULZER. In that connection may I ask the gentleman a question for information?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. Has the committee made any provision in this bill for an increase in the salaries of the various clerks in the Post-Office Department?

Mr. WEEKS. The committee has provided for the increase which is required by the provision, for automatic promotions, which promotes clerks in post-offices of the first class up to $1,100 a year; in post-offices of the second class up to $1,000 a year, and 50 per cent of eligibles to the $1,200 grade in first-class offices, and 50 per cent of eligibles to $1,100 in second-class offices. In so far as the provisions of this bill are concerned, they are exactly as last year.

Mr. SULZER. Then, as I understand it, there is no increase in salaries of clerks of first-class post-offices?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, yes. Automatically they are promoted from $600 to $1,000, being raised $200 the first year, and $100 a year up to $1,100.

Mr. SULZER. I am glad to hear that, because a great many people are very much interested in the matter. I do not think the committee has gone far enough, however, in increasing the pay of the post-office clerks. There should be a substantial increase all along the line. I think all the post-office clerks should get more pay, on account of the increased cost of living. Most of these clerks have families, and they can not possibly live on the pay they are now getting from the Government. I am in favor of more pay for all these clerks.

Mr. WEEKS. I am very glad to have the judgment of the gentleman from New York on this subject.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it not true that the new clerks taken on must be in the $600 grade?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. As I understand, the bill at present provides for an increase of that grade of 296, and the recommendations of the department was for 1,800?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. How can these new clerks be taken on unless you change that $600?

Mr. WEEKS. They can not be.

Mr. MANN. On that point will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin to answer the question.

Mr. STAFFORD. I might explain to the gentleman from Missouri the difficulty under which he is laboring whereby they will be enabled to provide for the maximum number of new clerks that enter the service. Even though the number designated is but 296 in the $600 grade, I direct the gentleman's attention to the present law, which provides for 6,961 clerks of the $1,200 class. On December 31 last there were 5,870 clerks of that class employed, leaving about 1,100 places available. The phraseology of the bill is "6,961 clerks, at not exceeding $1,200." Those words "not exceeding" enable the department to appoint any number of additional clerks in the grades below that will aggregate in the appropriations the difference between 6,900 and 5,870 at the rate of $1,200. In any lower grade they can distribute that unused amount and employ additional clerks. In the bill we are now considering, instead of providing for 6,961 clerks of the $1,200 grade, we follow the estimates of the department and provide for 10,345.

Now, I venture to say that there will not be at any time within the next fiscal year 10,345 men employed in the maximum grade of $1,200. Therefore the difference in number will enable the department to appoint a greater number of clerks in the grades below, from $1,200 to $600, than that stated in the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman say that if appropriation is made for one $1,200 clerk, and he is not appointed, the Postmaster-General may use the money to pay two $600 clerks?

Mr. STAFFORD. He can use that $1,200 for one $1,100 clerk and use the balance of $100 in some other grade below, or employ a clerk in some other grade or employ two $600 clerks. So he utilizes the unused appropriations for distribution in the grades below, when required by the needs of the service. That is the actual method of administration as now carried on by the department.

Mr. BORLAND. Why does not the bill carry the number of $600 clerks necessary to keep the service full? If that is where the service must be recruited, if the $800 and $900 clerks must come from the $600 grade, why does not the bill carry a sufficient appropriation to keep the $600 grade full?

Mr. STAFFORD. In the present bill we make provision for 1,625 clerks at not exceeding $600.

Mr. BORLAND. That is in the last bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. In the present law. On December 31 there were in that grade 3,570 clerks employed, or twice the number that we made provision for, and I have explained to the gentleman the method by which the department is enabled to employ the required number of clerks necessary for the growth of the service in the lower grades, even though the number authorized in the bill is much less than those actually in the service.

Mr. BORLAND. What I am trying to arrive at is the reason for that method of appropriation. Why not specify the number of new clerks at $600 a year which the committee finds to be necessary to fill the service?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will take a copy of the hearings and former hearings and read the history of the arrangement, I think he will have an ample understanding; but I do not wish to trespass longer on the time of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SULZER. I am glad to have the gentleman's statement regarding the matter. I wish to congratulate the committee on having made some progress. It is a very important matter to many deserving men. I am with them in their efforts to get better wages. But I am sorry to say in cases like this it seems we always make progress slowly—too slowly for me.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman in regard to the clerks who, he says, were authorized by the last appropriation bill, 1,473 in number. What I want to know is whether the right of the department to appoint and employ those clerks does not end on the 30th of June?

Mr. WEEKS. Not at all. The comptroller has decided that it extends over two years from the beginning of the fiscal year in which it is authorized.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is mistaken about that.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think I am.

Mr. MANN. Let me see if I can not explain it. The same number is carried in this bill.

Mr. WEEKS. The same limitation is carried in this bill. The number is 33,200.

Mr. MANN. This increased number carried in this bill has not yet been appointed.

Mr. WEEKS. That is true.

Mr. MANN. They can not appoint any clerk after the 30th of June under the old law.

Mr. WEEKS. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. The same number is carried in this bill.

Mr. OLCOTT. If that is the fact, then I do not see any way by which more than 47 more clerks can be employed.

Mr. WEEKS. There is a provision for 33,200 clerks.

Mr. MANN. For the next fiscal year you can only appoint 47 more clerks than the department could have appointed for this year; but, not having need of them all this year, they are not appointed this year. Taking the number that they did not appoint this year, that they might have appointed, that gives room for the increase next year.

Mr. OLCOTT. If they still have the right to appoint 1,473 clerks, I am satisfied.

Mr. MANN. That increase is specifically carried in this bill, and the money is provided for it. The money is not provided by the current law.

Mr. WEEKS. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. GUERNSEY. In connection with the gentleman's statement, I would like to inquire whether or not the appropriation recommended by the committee is sufficient to give the assistant postmasters 50 per cent with this limitation placed on the salary by law?

Mr. WEEKS. Not in all cases.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Why should not the appropriation be sufficient to give them 50 per cent?

Mr. WEEKS. Because the department thinks it is not necessary to pay them 50 per cent of the postmasters' salaries.

Mr. GUERNSEY. In the event that the department should determine otherwise, it seems to me that there ought to be an appropriation enough to pay them.

Mr. WEEKS. The department knows the conditions in every post-office, and the committee has adopted the department's estimates for the appropriation for assistant postmasters. The department takes into consideration the conditions governing each case in fixing the salary.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Apparently this bill provides for 296 new clerks in the minimum grade. Now, under the classification act that is the only grade to which a new clerk can be appointed?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Also under that law the clerk can be increased but $100 a year, and that at the end of the year in the lower grades?

Mr. WEEKS. Two hundred dollars the first year and $100 the year after.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes. Assuming that there are 296 original vacancies and 1,500 unfilled vacancies of last year, how is it going to be possible under the law, within this year, to appoint more than 296 clerks when the appointment can only be made to the minimum grade, and men can not be promoted until the end of the year?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know whether the gentleman has been here during the last half hour or not.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I have not.

Mr. WEEKS. That has all been thrashed over and explained.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Then I will read it in the RECORD. Is the gentleman answering interrogatories in relation to other parts of the bill?

Mr. WEEKS. No; I should rather prefer to go on.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to say that I was interested in the figures that the gentleman gave showing the increase in the salaries of clerks and the cost of railway mail service, and so forth. I would like to ask if the gentleman can give us the information as to the increase in salaries during the ten-year period?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman from South Dakota state in what respect he wishes the question answered.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The percentage of increase.

Mr. WEEKS. I have not the percentages figured out, but the number of railway postal clerks was increased from 8,695 to 16,044. The appropriation for them was increased from $8,839,000 to $18,356,000. In other words, the appropriation increased in about the same ratio that the number of railway postal clerks increased.

The number of post-office clerks was increased from 14,886 to 31,048. The appropriation was increased from $12,404,000 to $34,876,000, or about 140 per cent, instead of about 100 per cent as in the case of the railway postal clerks.

Mr. McMORRAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. McMORRAN. I would like to know from the chairman of the committee from his brief experience in charge of the Post-Office Committee, whether, with the investigation he has made in making up this appropriation bill, there is, in his judgment, any future possibility that the receipts of this Government for the post-office service will take care of the expenditures so long as the present methods of operation are continued?

Mr. WEEKS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to say in answer to that question that if this House will adopt the recommendation of the Post-Office Committee in this bill without making any increase the receipts will come nearer to paying the expenses of the Post-Office Department in 1911 than they have for the last twenty-five years.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Chairman, speaking from a business standpoint and from the gentleman's own experience in handling business, where a case occurs in business where the volume of business may be increased, say, 5 per cent, does it show good business policy to have the expense ratio increase 10 per cent?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to go into great detail in answering that question, but the Post-Office Department is the only business I have ever known where the expense ratio for employees increased faster than the business itself. For instance, the number of pieces of mail handled increased from a few pieces over 7,000,000,000 in 1900 to a few pieces over 14,000,000,000 in 1909, just about doubling in number. The receipts for the Post-Office Department just about doubled in that nine-year period, but we see that the force necessary to do this business has more than doubled—has doubled in the number of railway mail clerks, has doubled in the number of carriers, has considerably more than doubled in the number of clerks in first and second class post-offices, and the appropriation for clerks in the first and second class post-offices has increased not 100 per cent, as one might expect, but 140 per cent.

I doubt if there is a Member of this House who can instance a business which has doubled in a period of years, conducted under the same general conditions, where the force necessary to conduct that business has increased more than 75 per cent, and many businesses do not require an increase of force of more than 10 per cent. The best estimate that I can make in case a business doubles its capacity or doubles its volume is that the number of employees will increase from 10 to 75 per cent, and yet we see in the Post-Office Department that the number of employees has more than doubled.

Mr. McMORRAN. Taking up this bill, I would like to know, Mr. Chairman, whether the gentleman in charge of it has followed his own judgment in making the several appropriations as to whether they were necessary, or whether he has followed the line of his predecessors, disregarding his own judgment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan asks in making up this bill if I have followed my own judgment. He is well aware that I have been chairman of this committee but a very short time; that, comparatively, I know little of the past history of the Post-Office Department.

The lines of previous appropriations have been followed. Reductions have been made where the committee believed they could be made. I want to say, and I say it with considerable satisfaction, that these recommendations come from the Post-Office Committee with a unanimous report. I do not mean to say that every member of the Post-Office Committee approves of every item in the bill, but there was not a roll call in considering any of the items, and the committee makes no minority report. Substantially it is the unanimous report of the committee, many of the members of which have served on it for years, in fact during their entire service in Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question in regard to the cost of carrying the mails.

Mr. WEEKS. I will ask the gentleman to wait for a moment before asking that, because I intend to take up that subject shortly.

Mr. BATES. Very well.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the other considerable item in the appropriation for the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General is for carriers. This appropriation has been cut down from the estimate of the department of $31,500,000 to $31,000,000. The average number of carriers appointed during the past nine years has been 1,366.

The number of carriers appointed during the first six months of the current year was 243. It is estimated that the total number necessary for appointment during this year will be 328. The number of carriers appropriated for in the bill for the current year was 1,300. There will be a balance left over at the end of this year, if the department's estimates are correct, of 972 carriers. Therefore the committee reduced the estimates of the department to 1,000 additional carriers, making available for the coming year 1,972 appointments, which undoubtedly is many more than will be required.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I understand that under the present law regulating the promotion of carriers, it takes five years' continuous service to reach the $1,100 grade.

Mr. WEEKS. Four years.

Mr. BORLAND. And from the $1,100 grade to the $1,200 grade the appointment is only upon the recommendation of the postmaster.

Mr. WEEKS. Fifty per cent of the availables are appointed.

Mr. BORLAND. That is on the recommendation of the postmaster?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Has any step been taken by the committee to have that appointment depend upon the length of service with a good record, without any indorsement of the postmaster?

Mr. WEEKS. It is the purpose of the department to base that recommendation on the efficiency record, without regard to the length of service.

Mr. BORLAND. Without regard to the length of service?

Mr. WEEKS. Without regard to the length of service. When they have reached the limit under automatic promotions, $1,100 promotions from that level to the $1,200 grade are based on efficiency, and 50 per cent of the eligibles are provided for in this bill, as was done last year.

Mr. BORLAND. And that record of efficiency is founded on the recommendation of the postmaster?

Mr. WEEKS. It is.

Mr. BORLAND. And no change made in that respect?

Mr. WEEKS. No.

Mr. BORLAND. Did the committee think that was wise?

Mr. WEEKS. There was no recommendation or suggestion that it should not be done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the gentleman leaves that point, has there not been complaint of this putting into the hands of the postmasters in various towns the power of control over carriers entirely separate from merit? Has not that caused a great deal of complaint?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, there has not a word of complaint come to the committee or any member of the committee, as far as I know, that it has caused any dissatisfaction. Furthermore, my judgment is that the postmaster is the proper man to determine as to the efficiency of his employees, those who are serving under him. I do not see how anybody could do it as well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That was formerly the case, and the recommendation of the postmaster controlled, but since the reform of this service, which was intended to give the carriers a promotion as a matter of right, by the introduction of this method of giving promotions, the postmaster could exert political control over his carriers.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the right does not continue beyond the $1,100 grade in the offices of the first class or $1,000 in offices of the second class. Congress especially stipulated that automatic promotions should stop at those salaries in those offices, but that promotions might be continued, based on efficiency, to the extent of 50 per cent of the eligibles, and we are carrying that out exactly as was done in last year's bill. It has proved satisfactory as far as I know.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the gentleman state why that distinction was made between one grade and all the others?

Mr. WEEKS. Because some men are more efficient than others. Nobody has any authority to stop their promotion until they reach $1,100. There are men who are especially efficient who ought to be promoted, but there are men who are indifferent, who may be within the efficiency line, who are satisfactory to some extent, but are not sufficiently efficient, in the opinion of the postmaster, to justify this promotion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the chairman of the committee see any possible safeguard anywhere to prevent the postmaster from exercising a political dictatorship? Now, I understand there is considerable complaint, I know there is complaint, that postmasters in certain places do exercise that political dictatorship which was intended to be obviated in this grade of the service.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska is a great deal more fearful of political dictation than I am.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, favoritism, in the nature of favoritism.

Mr. WEEKS. I have had, Mr. Chairman, during the last four months every kind of complaint that could be thought of as applied to the postal service, and I have yet to receive a letter or notice from anyone, Congressman or otherwise, of partiality having been used in the selections made by postmasters from the $1,100 to the $1,200 in first-class offices and from $1,000 to the $1,100 in second-class offices.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman will now permit me to finish my question——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. As I understand the present law, Mr. Chairman, it provides that the postmaster has the power not only to select the men who shall be promoted from the $1,100 to the $1,200 grade, but he has power to reduce the salary of carriers guilty of an infraction of the rules.

Mr. WEEKS. That is a regulation of the department, if it exists.

Mr. BORLAND. Now, then, does the committee consider the question of making those infractions of the rules subject to a thirty-day or a greater lay off without change in the annual salary?

Mr. WEEKS. There is no recommendation on the part of the department to do that, and it was not brought to the attention of the committee.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the committee think it is unwise to lodge in the postmaster the power to reduce the annual salary of a man?

Mr. WEEKS. I submit it is unfair to ask a question about what the committee thinks of matters that have never been brought before the committee and to which the committee has never given any consideration. The time for the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] to bring that before the committee was when the bill was being considered.

Mr. BORLAND. Was it ever brought to the attention of the committee?

Mr. WEEKS. Not since I have been on the committee.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Is it not the fact about this promotion that this classification law was adopted three years ago, and two years ago the $1,100 carriers all went to $1,200, and if Congress appropriates the money all of them can go now, and 50 per cent is simply the judgment of the department and the Post-Office Committee of the number that ought to go up this year?

Mr. WEEKS. That is correct. We followed the action of the committee last year, and the House indorsed that action. We also followed the recommendation of the department.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is absolutely certain that reducing, as he has, the estimate of the department thirty-one and one-half millions to thirty millions that fully 50 per cent of the carriers of the $1,100 grade can go to $1,200?

Mr. WEEKS. There is no doubt of it in my mind, and my judgment is that we have provided for a thousand more carriers than will probably be needed.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Did the committee take into consideration that if the 50 per cent rate is continued each year, the number of men in the $1,100 grade, and I am alluding now to the number of individuals that were not promoted, will continually increase?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think that is correct.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If the gentleman would take a pencil and figure it out he would see it is correct.

Mr. WEEKS. I have not time to do that now. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the promotions in clerks in the different grades. There are now 6,961 clerks in the $1,200 grade. Under the promotions provided in this bill there will be 10,345. In the $1,100 grade promotions there are now 7,815; there will be 9,007. In the $1,000 grade there are now 6,000; there will be 3,950. In the $900 grade there are now 5,000; there will be 3,950. In the $800 grade there are now 4,000; there will be 2,400. In the $600 grade there are now 1,625; there will be 296. In other words, the lower grades are constantly decreasing and the upper grades are constantly increasing, and will continue to do so, under this process, each year.

Mr. BENNET of New York. As to the converse of those figures, can the gentleman give the number of men who remained behind in the $1,100 grade last year as compared with the year before?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to inform the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] that he has already occupied one hour.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I notice here one proposition, and that is in the reclassification of the rural free-delivery service——

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman wait until I reach that? I will take it up a little later.

Mr. POU. I certainly will.

Mr. GOULDEN. Why was an arbitrary rate of 50 per cent fixed for the salaries, and by whom was it fixed?

Mr. WEEKS. That was the recommendation of the department, and it was agreed to by the House last year.

Mr. GOULDEN. And the committee thought that was fair?

Mr. WEEKS. The committee thought that was fair.

Mr. GREENE rose.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire whether the committee considered the question of the condition of substitutes in the various offices. They are very limited now, both as to the amount of pay they draw and also as to employment.

Mr. WEEKS. The committee made no change in the department's recommendation about substitutes.

Mr. GREENE. There has been no recommendation to make any change?

Mr. WEEKS. No.

Mr. Chairman, the appropriation for the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General for the current year is $88,732,000. The appropriations for this office covers transportation of mails.

The Post-Office Department estimated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, $90,724,975. The committee recommend $88,905,775. The principal change, and the most important item for this office, is the appropriation for carrying the mails by railroads. The committee has reduced the recommendation of the estimates made by the department from $46,620,000 to $45,500,000; and it reduces the recommendation for this service from the appropriations for the past year $1,083,875.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Has the committee made any comparison between the rates charged by the railroads to the express companies and the rates charged to the Government for carrying the mail; and if so, what is the result of this comparison?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the committee has not made any sufficiently definite comparison, so it can not make any statement to the House at this time. The comparison involves a great many different conditions, on some of which the committee has no information, and until we make further investigation the committee does not care to make any suggestion in regard to that matter.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, it was somewhat in line with that inquiry I rose before to interrogate the chairman of the committee. I have received in the last month a large number of letters from residents of my district, and I think that other Members of the House have received similar letters from their districts, protesting against the proposed increase in the rate on second-class mail matter, both newspapers and magazines; and then adding, as an argument for the reason why there ought not to be an increase in the rates for carrying magazines and newspapers, that this Government was paying too much to the railroads for carrying the mails, and insisting that express companies have their matter carried for about one-third the rate paid by the Government for carrying this matter in the Railway Mail Service.

The proposition seemed preposterous, and yet for my own information and, I think, for the information of the people who are writing these letters by the hundreds, and possibly by the thousands—possibly the letters are inspired, I do not know as to that—it would be very desirable that some information be given the committee on this point, whether the railroads are discriminating against the Government because it is a government, and they are carrying the matter for private corporations at cheaper rates than they are carrying second-class matter, or any class of mail matter. It is merely for the purpose of endeavoring to shed some light on this question that I rose to interrogate the Chairman.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I presume the gentleman does not desire me to enter into a discussion of that matter at any length at this time.

Mr. BATES. Not at all at this time.

Mr. WEEKS. I have been receiving for the last month about 500 letters a day of the same character that the gentleman refers to. I think I am safe in saying that 95 per cent of those letters have been inspired. They do not ask if these facts are true, but make the assertion that they are true. In making that assertion, if true, they evidently have more information than the Post-Office Department or the Post-Office Committee of the House, or the publishers who have appeared before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. Nobody knows whether some of these statements are correct or not. The probabilities are that they are incorrect.

The probabilities are, Mr. Chairman, that the pay to the railroads is substantially near what it ought to be. There are members of the committee who have given a great amount of consideration to this question who believe that the pay to certain railroads is less than it ought to be; and, on the other hand, the pay to other railroads may be greater than it ought to be. But one must consider all the conditions covering such a question before he can come to a definite conclusion. For instance, the requirements which the Government makes of the railroads are very much more severe than the requirements which express companies make of the railroads. For instance, let me illustrate that: The Government requires more room in a postal car for the same kind of business than does an express company. On an average, something like 2 tons of mail are carried in a postal car, and something like 12 tons of express are carried in an express car. This is due to several reasons, which I do not care to go into, but that is the fact. The railroads furnish the Government apartments in cars which are less than 40 feet in length, for which the railroads receive no pay at all.

When the express company uses space in a car it either pays for the space, however small it is, or else the railway employee handles the express matter and the express company pays part of the salary of the railway employee. Along the line of the railroad, if the post-office is within 80 rods of the station, the railroad transports the mail to and from the post-office and receives no pay for it. At terminals, if any space is required for the handling of the mail, as very much space is required, the railroad furnishes the space, lights and heats it, and assists in handling the mail. On the other hand, the express company, if it uses any space in a terminal, pays for it.

In very many more ways, which I could instance if I had the time, the conditions are so dissimilar that a conclusive answer can not be given to that question at this time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does not the gentleman think that the committee ought to investigate that question, so as to be able to give the information required by Members of the House?

Mr. WEEKS. I am glad to say, for the benefit of the gentleman from Georgia, that the Post-Office Department several months ago sent out a very comprehensive list of questions relating to the handling of railway mail, and that answers to these questions are coming in; there is a paragraph in this bill providing $10,000 for the purpose of tabulating those answers, and the committee hopes to get some valuable information from them.

Mr. SCOTT. Pursuing a bit further the inquiry made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, a great many of us, in the letters to which he has alluded, have noticed allegations that the mail service of Canada was conducted at a profit, notwithstanding the fact that there was a smaller charge made for second-class mail matter than in this country. Has that matter been inquired into at all by the gentleman's committee?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I will very briefly answer that. The conditions in Canada are entirely different from the conditions in this country. The persons who make those allegations do not consider conditions at all. They make a flat statement and let it go at that. But let me point out to the committee the differences in the conditions in Canada and in this country. In the first place, the railroads in Canada are subsidized. They are governmental organizations, in a sense, and nobody knows just exactly what the rates in Canada are; but I have here the method of arriving at those rates:

> His Majesty's mail and persons traveling therewith and on postal service shall at all times be carried on any railway in Canada on such terms and conditions and under such regulations as are made by the governor in council.

That is all the information we have as to the rates paid to railroads for carrying mails in Canada; but there are other conditions which are so entirely dissimilar that I am sure they will appeal to the gentleman from Kansas.

For instance, the Canadian government pays its employees about two-thirds as much as our employees receive. If we paid our employees the same scale of pay as that which is in force in Canada we would save from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 annually. We would turn a deficit of $17,000,000 into a profit of probably $25,000,000.

There is no rural delivery service in Canada. Last year we made a loss of $28,000,000 on our Rural Delivery Service. In every condition that I have been able to find the services are along such distinctly different lines that no fair comparison can be made, and in making the broad statement that the Canadian post-office department pays a profit of $800,000 a year, while we show a deficit, those differences in conditons should have been taken into consideration by the maker of the statement.

I want to make another comparison, which I nearly overlooked. The Canadian government evidently wishes to encourage the publication of periodicals in Canada. They have reduced the rates on second-class mail originating in Canada to a quarter of a cent a pound. At the same time they have made the rate for carrying publications into Canada 4 cents a pound. Heretofore most of the publications other than newspapers sold in Canada have been of American production. This absolutely shuts out the American publisher, unless he sends across the line by freight and remails in Canada.

In fact, with the exception of three or four publishers, our publishers have given up the Canadian market, and the one-quarter cent a pound which Canada charges for carrying second-class mail is no criterion whatever as to the cost of the service.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SCOTT. I have not had time, Mr. Chairman, to read the hearings before the Post-Office Committee, but I believe there was a delegation representing the magazines and periodicals which enjoy the second-class privileges that was heard by the committee, was there not?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. Did that delegation represent that it had made an investigation which warranted it in protesting against any increase in the second-class rates; and as a result of its investigation, did it claim that there was an overpayment to the railroads on the part of the United States for carrying the mails?

Mr. WEEKS. The publishers were represented by Mr. Wilder, of Everybody's Magazine, who made a very complete statement of the relations of the publishers to this service. They did complain that the Post-Office Department, in their judgment, was not thoroughly well administered. They did claim that it was the general impression that more was paid for railway transportation than the facts warranted; but Mr. Wilder added, in answer to a direct question—I do not undertake to use his exact words—that he was of the impression personally that the railroads were not paid materially more than they should be. But to sum up, the publishers had no facts regarding the cost of the Railway Mail Service, and did not pretend to have.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can give any opinion or estimate as to the rate per pound paid the railway companies for carrying the mails?

Mr. WEEKS. I can give the gentleman from Iowa the rate by a method——

Mr. HAUGEN. The average rate per pound per mile?

Mr. WEEKS. I can not give you that. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I might interrupt to say that the so-called "Moody commission" that investigated the subject of railway mail transportation and pay ten years ago found that the average rate per pound for transportation was 2¾ cents.

Mr. HAUGEN. Upon what did they base that estimate; has the mail ever been weighed?

Mr. STAFFORD. There were very careful weighings of the mail.

Mr. HAUGEN. Of the second-class matter?

Mr. STAFFORD. Of all classes of matter. Three years ago, when we provided for a postal commission, we gave directions for the mails to be weighed, and there was a weighing of all classes of mail, and these returns are at the disposal of any Member of Congress.

Mr. HAUGEN. Can the gentleman from Wisconsin state the number of pounds carried?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I am not a walking encyclopedia that can give these statistics offhand. If I had access to the reports now, I could give them.

Mr. HAUGEN. I beg to differ with the gentleman from Wisconsin. I have made inquiries at the department, and they say they do not know of any way of estimating the number of pounds carried in any class of mail.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have never heard any department official take the position that there was no way of telling the amount, but I have heard them state that they knew the weight pretty accurately of the different classes of mails and the distance carried.

Mr. HAUGEN. My understanding is that no weighing has ever been made, and in order to ascertain the rate of pay it would be necessary to ascertain the number of pounds carried.

Mr. WEEKS. There have been weighings of the mail. The different classes of all the mails have been weighed. The department estimates the net weight of the mails for 1908 as follows:

Net weight of mail for 1908.

	Pounds.
First class	167, 502, 610
Second class	785, 833, 110
Third class	179, 694, 654
Fourth class	58, 889, 400
Franked	4, 551, 080
Departmental	43, 092, 474
Foreign	60, 814, 956
Total	1, 300, 358, 284

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to say of my own knowledge that as a result of the direction by Congress to have weighings made, the department sent circulars to 90 per cent of all the post-offices, and the mail was weighed for thirty days, by classes, so that the department has accurate data of the amount of mail carried by classes, and the distances carried, and those data are now available and at the command of Congress or any Member of Congress.

Mr. HAUGEN. But never at any time has all of the mail been weighed at all parts of the country.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; at one and the same time, within thirty days, within the last three years, of my own personal knowledge.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will yield, I think that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] is trying to get at this, that there never has been in the United States a complete annual weighing.

Mr. HAUGEN. Exactly; that is my statement.

Mr. MURDOCK. There never has been in the United States a complete annual weighing. The weights for one whole year of twelve months, every day for three hundred and sixty-five days, have never been taken. The result is this, that any figures made upon the total amount of mail carried by the Government for one year is necessarily an estimate, because if we weigh the mails for six months it makes quite a material difference whether we weigh from January 1 to July 1 or from July 1 to January 1. If we do weigh for one of the six-month periods, one-half the year, the department arrives at the total weights for the year by a multiplication by two of the weights found, and, after all, the result is an estimate, as the gentleman from Iowa says.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean to controvert the statement that I made, that within the last three years there was a weighing in 90 per cent of the post-offices of this country of all classes of mail, and the distances to which those classes of mail were dispatched was taken, and also that there was a weighing at the same time on the railway mail cars?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I do not mean to controvert the gentleman's statement as to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the question of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] to which I replied, in which he took the position that there had been no weighing. I wish to emphasize again that there has been a weighing for thirty days, and it is an accurate basis for computation as to the classes of mail carried and the distances carried.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin this question: Does he then claim that there is no element of estimate in the total annual-weight figures?

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, of course, no one contends that there is not an element of estimate; no one who has had any knowledge of the service or who has not had any knowledge of it makes that contention, because all of us know that the weight and character of mail varies with the seasons of the year, but for that period, when this weight of mail was taken, it was a fair average and a suitable basis on which to calculate computations as to the weight of mail by classes and distance.

Mr. GOULDEN. In what month was that data obtained?

Mr. STAFFORD. In the fall of the year.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call to the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] this further statement regarding the weight of mail, that the amount carried in the year 1909 was a little over 1,400,000,000 pounds, and the department estimates that 48 per cent of the weight of the mail is equipment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I noticed a little while ago that the gentleman read these figures, substantially, 4,000,000 pounds of franked mail and 43,000,000 pounds of departmental mail. Is not departmental mail franked mail?

Mr. WEEKS. No; that is what is known as "penalty mail." Franked mail simply applies to mail sent by Members of the House and Senators.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The great bulk of the departmental mail is franked.

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, that is simply the Post-Office Department's method of dividing the two.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does either of them pay postage?

Mr. WEEKS. No.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. So, then, the impression would be that there were only 4,000,000 pounds that went free of postage, when, as a matter of fact, 47,000,000 pounds were carried that did not pay postage. Does not the gentleman think that the department ought to be credited with 47,000,000 pounds rather than with 4,000,000 pounds?

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman wants to take that question up, I will say that I am personally in favor of providing a stamp to cover all penalty and franked mail, and find out just exactly how much of that mail we are carrying free; but, as a matter of fact, we are carrying penalty and franked mail to the extent of probably the number of pounds to which the gentleman refers, and it is all carried without postage.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the statement were left that there were 4,000,000 pounds of franked mail and 43,000,000 pounds of departmental mail, the impression of the casual reader would be that there were only 4,000,000 pounds of mail that went free of postage, when, as a matter of fact, there are 47,000,000 pounds.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, we do not wish to deceive anyone.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Oh, I understand that.

Mr. WEEKS. And I will put in the RECORD that penalty mail is free mail.

Mr. HAUGEN. I understood the chairman to state that in the aggregate about 1,031,000,000 pounds of mail matter are carried.

Mr. WEEKS. One billion, three hundred million pounds in the year 1908 and 1,400,000,000 pounds in the year 1909. That is mail, and practically the same amount of equipment is carried, so that amount, practically, should be doubled in getting the amount of weight which the railroad companies actually carry.

Mr. HAUGEN. Can the gentleman state the amount paid the railroads?

Mr. WEEKS. About $50,000,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. That includes the cars?

Mr. WEEKS. That includes the cars.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Forty-four million six hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. LOWDEN. Does not this $44,000,000 include a very large item of the Post-Office Department, and if that were charged off, would not the expenses of a large part of this $44,000,000 appear as a charge against the Post-Office Department?

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly that is true; that includes all departmental mail. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Earlier in the gentleman's statement he made some suggestion that it might be well under some circumstances to have a business man at the head of Post-Office Department.

Mr. WEEKS. I did not make it in just those terms.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. You made the suggestion that under some circumstances it might be well to have one.

Mr. WEEKS. I made the suggestion it would be well to have a first-class traffic man to have charge of the transportation problem of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Have you made a provision for that?

Mr. WEEKS. No; but we have made provision for it in a bill which we hope to get up later. I desire to include in my remarks a schedule of rates of railway mail transportation which covers the present and recent laws on that subject.

Schedule of rates for railway-mail pay.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, I have taken some pains to prepare a few questions which I would like to ask, and I would like a little time——

Mr. WEEKS. Take some other time.

Mr. REEDER. Very well.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If the gentleman will permit a brief suggestion. Is it not a fact that if a carrier or clerk had complained to the gentleman about the inequality of promotion—the gentleman has replied that there were no complaints—such complaint would have made such carrier or clerk liable to dismissal, the chairman of the committee being a Member of Congress?

Mr. WEEKS. I think he would, but if the department were going to follow with great exactness the clerks who do interrogate Congressmen about various matters connected with an increase of salary, I am afraid there would be a vast number of vacancies in the postal service.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I am inclined to differ with the gentleman on that.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the appropriations for the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General for the current year was $2,216,000. The Post-Office Department estimated for the year ending June 30, 1911, $2,098,000. The committee recommends for that year $2,355,610, which appears to be an increase of $207,000, but the department made subsequent estimates which cover just that amount, so that the recommendation of the committee is substantially the estimates of the department for the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General. The office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General——

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an inquiry there?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. I notice an increase has been recommended in the following items—manufacturing stamped envelopes, $60,000. Are those the stamped envelopes which are sent out and sold by postmasters to the public generally?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. About which there is so much complaint?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. What is the policy of the committee and the department on that subject? Is it the policy or the intention in the future to go more generally into that business than in the past?

Mr. WEEKS. The department has a contract with a manufacturing company in Dayton, Ohio, for the manufacture of envelopes which terminates the 30th of June, 1911, There is a provision in this bill which will change the printing of these envelopes which the gentleman can read if he desires.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. The point I want to know is this: Whether it is the policy and desire of this committee to continue the policy that heretofore has been followed of going into the business of manufacturing these stamped envelopes and selling them.

Mr. WEEKS. As the Government had a contract for the manufacture of these envelopes, there was no change suggested by the department or considered by the committee in the hearings. Since the hearings terminated there has been much correspondence on the subject. Letters and telegrams without number have been coming in protesting against this policy of the department, but the committee had already inserted in the bill the provision which Members will find there, which will regulate in a different manner the printing on the envelope after the 30th of June, 1911.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, these newspapers want to do the printing on these envelopes, do they not, because the complaint is that the Government does it for nothing? These people would charge three or four dollars a thousand, and they complain of being cut off from that three or four dollars a thousand.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not want at this time to get into a discussion of this question, but I will answer the gentleman from New York by saying that the department's contract for making the envelopes, embossing the stamps, and printing the return, is at the rate of 79 cents a thousand.

The department sells those envelopes for $1.24 per thousand. The profit last year was about $350,000. The printing of the return on the envelope, it is estimated, costs about three-quarters of a cent a thousand. That is what it would cost for the type and the ink. To answer the gentleman directly, I will say undoubtedly the printers who have appealed to Congress wish the Government to go out of the printing business, so that they may print the return on the envelopes. It is a pretty broad question, and I do not care to get into a discussion of it now other than to make that statement.

Mr. PAYNE. This word in addition: I have received some letters from envelope manufacturers protesting against the stamp being put on the envelope manufactured by the Government, as depriving them of some profit. I have not yet heard from the people who furnish the "gum-stickum" which goes on the stamp. I expect to hear from those later.

Mr. SCOTT. With the gentleman's permission, I would like to make this further statement on behalf of the printers. They not only complain against the competition of the Government in furnishing their customers with printed envelopes at no cost for the printing, but they complain that the Government uses the public money to push that business, that the department publishes attractive advertising matter and sends it all over the country, instructing the postmasters to hang it up in the post-offices, calling the attention of the public to the fact that they can secure their stamped envelopes with their return card on them more cheaply from the Government than they can obtain them from any other source.

Mr. WEEKS. I think those who make that complaint are mistaken. I think that advertising matter is prepared and is sent out by the firm which has the contract. The Government does not do this work. The work is entirely done by contract with a firm in Dayton, Ohio.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to say, in response to that, when I went personally to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General to protest, he not only admitted the practice, but defended it by declaring it was a part of his business to push the sale of these goods.

Mr. WEEKS. Why, Mr. Chairman, so far as the committee has any evidence, it is to the effect that the department has authorized the placing of these advertisements in post-offices to attract the attention of people who may wish to purchase stamped envelopes.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. I want to call the attention of the gentleman further to the fact that the very next item justifies the views taken by my colleague [Mr. SCOTT], and justifies the newspapers and the publishers in making protest against the Post-Office Department making the postmasters agents and assistants to distribute stamped envelopes and helping to work up their trade.

Mr. WEEKS. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas is entirely mistaken in what he thinks the next item is for. That item is for the government agent at the factory to superintend and see that the shipments are made, and so forth. That has nothing whatever to do with what he has in mind.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield? Is it not an advantage to the business public to be supplied with these return envelopes printed?

Mr. WEEKS. Why, there is no question about it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SCOTT. Then should not the business public pay for it?

Mr. MANN. They are doing it now. Then you would have that provision made for the benefit of the printing offices in the towns. That would amount to a subsidy to those printing offices.

Mr. SCOTT. Why ought not they to do the printing?

Mr. WEEKS. I must insist on going on with my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield further.

Mr. WEEKS. The appropriation for the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General for the current year is $38,599,000. The estimate of the department for the year ending June 30, 1911, is $39,598,500. Later, however, the department made another estimate reducing that amount by $900,000.

The committee recommends for the coming fiscal year $38,867,260, which is $300,000 more than the department's revised estimate.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I notice that the appropriation about the rural carriers contained in this bill is about $300,000 increase over that of 1910. Does this mean that there are to be no more rural routes established for the next year, or is there any provision for new routes?

Mr. WEEKS. This appropriation provides for the rural carriers now in the service on the present routes at the present rate of pay and an additional amount for the establishment of new routes amounting to $545,000. There will be on hand at the end of this year $245,000 for the establishment of additional routes under the estimates. The committee added $300,000 to the department's estimate, making $545,000 available for the extension of the service in 1911.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Is it not a fact that there are now about 2,000 applications for new routes pending in the Post-Office Department, with favorable reports?

Mr. WEEKS. I am informed that there are between 1,500 and 2,000 applications, and between 800 and 900 of those have been recommended favorably.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Will the allowances that you have made permit the establishment of those routes; or if not, how many of them?

Mr. WEEKS. It would depend entirely upon the time of year the route was established.

Mr. AUSTIN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question: If this additional appropriation carried in the bill for the extension of the Rural Route Service will not provide for about 500 additional routes?

Mr. WEEKS. It would provide, Mr. Chairman, for about 600 additional routes if they were all established the 1st day of July.

Mr. AUSTIN. That would give about an average of 12 routes to each State?

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman can figure that out for himself.

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, is it not a fact, Mr. Chairman, that there are 1,600 petitions awaiting action on the part of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, 1,000 petitions investigated and approved, and 670 of them have not been examined, and that additional appropriation will provide service for not exceeding 600 of these additional routes, or an average of about 12 additional routes for each State in the Union?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I answered that question before. I think the gentleman's figures are a little excessive, but substantially correct. He must remember that if all these routes were established on the first day of the year the amount provided by the bill would only provide for about 600, but if they were established January 1 it would provide for about 1,200.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand it from the gentleman's own statement, there are 900 of these routes that are already approved. Then would it not follow that they ought to be established right now? And if that be true, then, from the gentleman's own statement, as I interpret it, at least, there would be an insufficient amount of money appropriated to put into effect the routes that are already reported upon favorably.

Mr. WEEKS. It undoubtedly is a fact that if those routes were all established at once there would not be sufficient money.

Mr. NORRIS. What excuse could be offered, excepting the lack of appropriation, that would prohibit the establishment of a route after it had been investigated and a favorable report made upon it?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not want to go into it in great detail, but in a word the reason is this, that provision has been made for all of the service that is now provided in this bill, but in a time of almost national financial distress, when the Treasury is on the verge of needing an issue of bonds to pay operating expenses, it is not believed by the President or the Post-Office Department that unusual expansions of the service should be made. It is believed that this is a time when we should go slowly about extending services; that we should provide for the most important cases, where there are a large number of people who could be served, and that the cases that could be put over for another year should go over. That, in a word, is my answer to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course that is a complete answer, although I do not agree with the view taken. It does seem to me that if these routes are already approved, and, in fact, everything is done except to put them in, it is unjust to the people who would be served by them to permit the money of the Government to serve older routes instead and thus discriminate.

Mr. WEEKS. I have great regard for the gentleman from Nebraska, and I want to ask him a question in my own time: If the gentleman were managing a business which was not profitable, and there seemed to be some demand for an extension of that business, would he go and borrow money for the purpose of extending that business when he knew that he was going to lose money by doing it?

Mr. NORRIS. I will answer the gentleman as frankly as he has asked the question. If I were engaged in a business such as the Post-Office Department is operating, I would refuse to use public money for the purpose of paying the expenses of a rural route in one place while declining to use it in another place where they had complied with the law and everything was done that could be done under the law to have the route established. In other words, I believe, instead of cutting out these routes where the people have complied with the law, if somebody must wait, we had better discontinue some other route where they had the facilities before, and treat all alike.

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman from Nebraska would never do that.

Mr. NORRIS. In the first place, I would not consider the Post-Office Department exactly as I would a business proposition; but it seems to me that it is an injustice to give one class of people the benefit of a rural route and deny it to others who have complied with the law. I think the people who have complied with the law and are not receiving the service are just as much entitled to it as the people who have complied with the law and are receiving it.

Mr. WEEKS. There are thousands of people in the gentleman's own district who are not served by any carrier service.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I have some in the very condition I have mentioned.

Mr. WEEKS. There are thousands of people who would not be served by carrier under any regulation which obtains in the department. If the gentleman's argument is correct, how can he say that any man, however remote he may live from transportation facilities, should not have the same facilities as the man who lives along a rural route.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman has perhaps unintentionally misconstrued what I said. What I said was that here on one side of a town are a class of people, the same in number perhaps, who have complied absolutely with the law. They are living along routes that are proposed to be established, and that ought to be established, while on the other side of the same town there are another class of people of the same kind, no greater in number, who are receiving the benefit of the rural-route service. This is unjust and unfair and should not be tolerated.

As far as I am concerned, since the gentleman asks my opinion, if I was running the Post-Office Department, even though it increased the deficit, I would treat all those who had complied with the law in regard to rural free-delivery service the same as any others.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the Republican platform it says:

We favor the extension of the rural free-delivery service until every community in the land can have the benefit of it.

Now, I say to the gentleman, speaking of the financial condition of the country as an excuse why the service should not be extended and the promise kept in good faith, that the President of the United States stated in his New York speech that under the Payne tariff bill we are raising a larger revenue per capita than we did under the Dingley tariff bill. So, the new revenue producer is bringing us more money, which will enable us to carry out the service and to keep the promise. And in addition to that the gentleman and this committee have the power and means of bringing a sufficient revenue into the Post-Office Department to give every community in the United States the benefit of the rural free-delivery service by taking from the express companies of this country a part of the postal business that belongs to the people of the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. I have been pretty liberal, I think, in yielding time to gentlemen to ask questions; but it is rather taking advantage of this liberality for the gentleman from Tennessee to inject a speech into the statement I am trying to make to the House. Later I will yield him time to make any speech he sees fit to make, if I have the time to yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asked the gentleman from Nebraska a question and I wanted to answer it.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I wish to call the gentleman's attention briefly to the hearings before his committee. On page 267 he asked a question of Mr. De Graw, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. For pay of letter carriers, substitutes for carriers on annual leave, clerks in charge of stations, and tolls and ferriage, rural delivery service, $37,345,000. You have recommended a reduction in that of $900,000.

Mr. DE GRAW. Mr. Chairman, that reduction is suggested in view of the existing condition of the government finances, and the consequent necessity for strict economy in all branches of the public service. It is the desire of the Postmaster-General, who in conference with his assistants has given the subject careful consideration, to defer further installation of rural delivery service except where necessary to maintain the efficiency of the service in operation, or where the establishment of new service seems imperatively required to meet demands which can not be met by existing facilities.

On page 265 Mr. De Graw said in answer to a question by Mr. FINLEY that there are 2,037 post-offices which will have been favorably acted upon and ready for installation in the rural free delivery route the 1st day of July next.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me say to the gentleman that I was present, and I do not think Mr. De Graw meant to say that they were to be favorably acted on, but that they would be acted upon and report made.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I will quote just what he said:

Mr. FINLEY. How many petitions will remain uninstalled on the 1st of next July at the present rate of expenditure?

Mr. DE GRAW. About 2,037 petitions.

Mr. FINLEY. Petitions that have been acted upon favorably?

Mr. DE GRAW. Yes, sir; that will have been acted upon favorably by that time.

Mr. FINLEY. And there will be 2,037 petitions pending on the 1st of July that will have received favorable action, and can not be installed at the present rate of expenditure?

Mr. DE GRAW. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEEKS. I was present, and I think his intention was to say that they would be acted on.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Subsequently in response to a question of Mr. STAFFORD he said that there were 977 already favorably reported upon, and that there were 672 now in the field being examined, on which he estimated that there would be 376 favorably acted upon, and that they were coming in, I think, at the rate of 150 a month, and he estimated that 37½ per cent of them would be acted upon, making an addition of 337, or a total of 1,690 acted upon by July next. In one place he says 2,037 and in another place he reduces it to 1,690.

I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think it is a little unfair to begin economy in the rural free-delivery service when it has grown so splendidly since it began, fourteen years ago, and we have so many routes approved and ready for installation?

Mr. WEEKS. There is no question about the rural free-delivery service having grown splendidly. There never has been any department of the Government that has grown as rapidly as it has. Congress has been extremely liberal, and we are facing a condition now where the President believes, and, I think, most others who have investigated it believe, that reasonable economy should be used in making extensions, and it seemed to the committee that this was a year when extensions of rural free-delivery service might be limited to a less number than would obtain in an ordinary year; the committee added to the estimate made by the department $300,000, which will apply to additional expenditure, making a total of $545,000.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. How are you going to determine which of the 1,690 routes, if you adopt the lesser number, and 2,037, if you adopt the larger number, shall be installed?

Mr. WEEKS. If I had it to do, I should take the case where there were the most people on the route; but that is a departmental matter, and I do not know what it will do.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Is it not quite unfair to give such splendid service as the gentleman says this is, to people who live on 41,103 routes, and deprive the remainder of the citizens of the country of the same kind of service?

Mr. WEEKS. We are simply deferring the installation of this rural service to a time when the finances will warrant their extension. If the gentleman from Louisiana wants to talk about fairness and unfairness he will find illustrations of unfairness in every branch of the government service, or any other service.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I notice that the increase for the rural free-delivery service during the current year was $1,400,000 over the previous year, and that there were only 475 routes established.

Mr. WEEKS. I will explain that to the gentleman by saying that the increase was largely to provide for routes that had been established already. The amount provided for the extension of the service for the current year was about $650,000; I do not remember the exact figures.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Will the gentleman explain why, when there are 977 routes now ready for installation, they do not use the money which the gentleman insists will be available as a surplus out of this year's revenue?

Mr. WEEKS. I can not answer that.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. It is a fact, is it not?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. De Graw testified before the gentleman's committee that there were 977 routes approved now, and he also testified he would have something like $245,000 surplus out of this rural delivery fund at the end of the current year. Why is he pursuing that policy?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think the department is installing many routes at this time, but as to the why or the wherefore of it the committee is not informed.

Mr. FASSETT. The gentleman who was giving the testimony said the reason was that the appropriation is made with reference to the possibility of all of the routes being started at once, but as a matter of fact, in practice, the routes were started a few at a time, from month to month, so that the cost would not all begin to run from one moment.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I agree to the truth of that proposition; and if he were to establish them for the fiscal year that is nearing its close, he could out of the $245,000 start a good many out of those 977.

Mr. FASSETT. I suppose if he had the money he could do it.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, what would become of the balance at the end of this fiscal year? Will that be carried over for another year?

Mr. WEEKS. That will be carried over and be available for next year.

Mr. BURNETT. It will not lapse into the Treasury?

Mr. WEEKS. No.

Mr. BURNETT. It will be available for next year, that nine hundred thousand and odd dollars?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, no; $245,000 is all that would be available for next year.

Mr. BURNETT. The additional amount that is put here in the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. The department estimated for the service which is now installed $245,000 to be carried over from this year, available for installing new service next year. The committee added $300,000 to that, making $545,000 available for installing new services next year.

Mr. BURNETT. How much of the appropriation heretofore made is unused?

Mr. WEEKS. At this time?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think I have those figures.

Mr. BURNETT. Can any gentleman of the committee give me that information as to how much balance is on hand under which these routes that are now pending and have been approved and recommended could be put in if established?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think over a quarter of a million of dollars, but I am not sure about that.

Mr. BURNETT. I want to know what will become of that money?

Mr. WEEKS. That will be available for installing routes next year.

Mr. BURNETT. Under this bill or automatically?

Mr. WEEKS. Automatically.

Mr. BURNETT. Then you have appropriated $285,000 more than you appropriated in the bill last year. I have the figures here before me, $37,645,000 for this year and $37,360,000 for last year, which would be, as I make it, $285,000 more than last year.

Mr. WEEKS. About that. I should have said $300,000.

Mr. BURNETT. In round numbers. That will be the extent of the extension of the service for the next year.

Mr. WEEKS. These figures including sufficient appropriation to pay all carriers and all expenses in the service now installed and $545,000 for the extension of the service.

Mr. BURNETT. Of the service?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. That is, including the whole country over from this year into the next year?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. How many routes would that be, roughly estimated?

Mr. WEEKS. I have stated it would depend on the time when they were installed. It would establish about 600 if they were established on the 1st day of July, but if they were established the middle of the year it would install 1,200.

Mr. BURNETT. It would not install, then, as many as are really now pending and favorably reported upon?

Mr. WEEKS. Probably not.

Mr. BURNETT. And for that reason, then, for the next year there could possibly be no extension of the service.

Mr. WEEKS. These installations will be extended along, I take it, for the next sixteen months.

Mr. BURNETT. But will there be any money to pay for that if they consume it?

Mr. WEEKS. It will be $545,000.

Mr. BURNETT. But it will absorb that to pay for the routes already pending and recommendations made, as I understand.

Mr. WEEKS. It may be the policy of the department to extend the more imperative cases. There may be cases of importance coming up, and they would apply it to those cases.

Mr. BURNETT. And turn down those that have now been approved for the fiscal year and approve routes coming in in the next fiscal year?

Mr. WEEKS. Some of them; yes.

Mr. BOEHNE. Is it not a fact that all unexpended balances of a fiscal year go into the General Treasury? Do I understand the chairman to say that this $245,000 will not be expended during this fiscal year, but can be carried over into the next?

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman, speaking technically, is correct. The money does revert into the Treasury, but we are providing this $245,000 and $300,000 more in this appropriation for the installation of that service.

Mr. BOEHNE. I do not believe the committee so understood the chairman.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think there can be any mistake about the committee understanding there is $545,000 available for the extension of the rural service for the year 1911.

Mr. BOEHNE. Is it not a fact, to begin with, that instead of $245,000 you have added $545,000 to the original estimates in order to bring it to that amount?

Mr. WEEKS. It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. SIMS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has been so exceedingly kind, and it is not often we have a chairman possessed of so much kindness and information together. I understood the gentleman to say the loss on the Rural Free-Delivery Service last year was $28,000,000.

Mr. WEEKS. In round numbers.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman mean gross or net loss?

Mr. WEEKS. Net loss.

Mr. SIMS. Should not the gentleman in all candor credit that amount with the cost of star-route service that has been displaced by the establishment of rural routes, amounting ot nearly $4,000,000?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think the change amounts to as much as the gentleman from Tennessee states. There have been some discontinuances of star-route services, and rural-delivery services installed, but the appropriation for the star-route service is larger than it was last year, which would indicate either the service was being extended as rapidly as it is being replaced by rural service.

Mr. SIMS. Should there not be another credit of something like $1,000,000 on account of the discontinuance of post-offices and the establishment of rural routes instead?

Mr. WEEKS. There is a credit there; I do not know how much it amounts to.

Mr. SIMS. Furthermore, has not the Government also made a profit by the disestablishment of small post-offices by reason of the establishment of rural routes, where the percentage of cancellation that went to salaries of post-masters exceeded the per cent of cancellation allowed at the initiating offices of the rural route?

Mr. WEEKS. The committee has no figures to that effect and if fourth-class post-offices have been discontinued I assume there will be a credit in that regard.

Mr. SIMS. And, while it can not be exactly stated, the amount so saved should be taken into consideration in treating this branch of the service justly. Furthermore, the department only credits the rural service with the mail collected on the routes, which amounted to $7,250,000, in round numbers. The number of pieces of mail collected is only 450,000,000, while the number delivered on rural routes is over 2,000,000,000, for which it does not give the rural service any credit, 45 per cent of which only is included in the second class.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I call to the gentleman's attention that you can not change the same pieces of mail——

Mr. SIMS. But it should be divided in all equity. You should credit the loss on the rural service with some portion of the vast deliveries made on the rural service of profit-producing mail, which was not done by the Postmaster-General, and I take it the chairman has been following the Postmaster-General in his statement of facts.

Mr. WEEKS. I gave the figures of the department in making the statement I did.

Mr. SIMS. That is what we all did at first, but the gentleman will excuse us if we do not accept right offhand the statement of the Postmaster-General, repeated by himself, that the net loss is $28,000,000 in rural service for the fiscal year 1909.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I should want to go into those figures more carefully before I give my assent to that proposition, but the gentleman has made some statements which are entitled to some consideration in giving the rural service a credit.

Mr. SIMS. Which it should justly have. Furthermore, mail put in post-offices at the initiation of a route which goes out on that route and only on that route should be credited to that route as though collected from the mail boxes and post-offices thereon, but the Postmaster-General does not even make a suggestion of that sort.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that there is no intention on the part of the committee to do any injustice or to discredit in any way the rural service. I think it has the heartiest sympathy and support of the committee. But the committee is preparing a bill which will fit the conditions which surround it, and in doing so it is not making a large appropriation for the extension of the service. That does not indicate any animosity or any enmity to the service. I do not wish the gentleman to put me in the position of being unfriendly to reasonable extension of the Rural Free-Delivery Service at this time or ample extension of it when the money is available for that purpose.

Mr. SIMS. I have no thought of such a thing. I believe the committee is liberal and reasonable, but I am afraid the Postmaster-General, judging from his report, has "cold feet" as to this service.

Mr. FASSETT. Was there not some suggestion looking to putting under one head in the department the star-route service and the Rural Free-Delivery Service, and that it would effect some economies and allow this last million dollars to go further than otherwise?

Mr. SMITH of California. I was just going to say, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], that where a letter is dropped in the mail box on a rural route in California, and destined for New York, the Postmaster-General gives the entire credit to the rural route.

Mr. SIMS. Well, there are over 2,000,000,000 pieces delivered and only about 450,000,000 received.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield for a question.

Mr. MACON. I desire to state that I received a communication from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, stating that he had adopted the plan of discontinuing the establishment of rural routes in the interest of economy. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill if he thinks that it is not a bad policy on the part of the department to begin its policy of economy at the expense of the farmers who support the world? They are certainly entitled to the very best mail facilities they can get. Many of the citizens of our cities are receiving their mails from six to twelve times a day, and I do not think the farmers should be told that they can not have one mail a day as long as that condition exists.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, what is the question?

Mr. MACON. The question is, if the gentleman thinks that it is a proper or wise policy for the Post-Office Department to begin its economies at the expense of the farmers of the country, in view of the fact that they support it?

Mr. WEEKS. Economies are being made in every branch of the Post-Office Department.

There are other matters in this bill which I hoped to discuss, but I can take them up during the reading of the bill. I ought to apologize to the committee for having detained it as long as I have. I want to say one word in conclusion to this effect, that in preparing this bill the committee has provided for every branch of the service as it is now established. It has provided for such extension of the service as it is believed the financial condition of the Government warrants it in doing. To do more than that would be, in my judgment, and I think in the judgment of the committee, an extravagance. I sincerely hope that the House, in considering this bill, will take into consideration not only the wishes of their constituents, but the condition of the Treasury as well. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a little later along I desire to offer some remarks on this bill. At present I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, my presence here on this floor is a complete voucher for my devotion to, and love for, the American flag, as well as my warrant for my patriotism. I represent a constituency that would never have sent me here had there been the least intimation or conjecture that I am lacking in either of these high essentials for membership in this House. Many high-sounding tributes have been paid both our flag and country by those who have advocated ship subsidy, evidently with the hope of making a bad argument appear the better. Our flag and our country have ever been the favorite themes for high pressure and high-colored eloquence, by means of which these advocates undertake to substitute the shadow for the substance. In discussing so serious a subject as government aid, by means of subsidy, to our merchant marine, it does not become us to be swept away by sentiment, nor to abase the American flag by using it to shield a vicious proposition.

Furthermore, as a Representative in Congress, I shall at all times, so far as lies within my power, cheerfully support all proper legislation that will increase and advance the volume of business for the citizens of the United States, in any legitimate and lawful manner that it can be done, within the limits of the Constitution, and without conferring special privileges on the few at the expense of the many. It shall always be my aim while a Representative to foster and aid American enterprise within the limitations stated. I am only too anxious for the time to come when there shall be more American ships sailing the ocean highways, entering every important port in every civilized country on the globe, ladened with American products, and, returning from these ports, bringing in American bottoms, such foreign commerce as may be essential to the welfare of our country that the economy of nature has denied us. I want to see this condition obtain at the earliest possible date, and firmly believe that in due course of time it will come to pass, and that if this branch of business is permitted to develop along correct business lines, it will be more stable, enduring, and efficacious.

Voting subsidy for the merchant marine is not unlike injecting morphia into the human system. It stimulates for a period, but in time the dose must be repeated oftener and in larger quantities. This is the exact proposition presented by the present situation. The purpose of the bill introduced, pursuant to the President's message on this subject, is to more than double the dose of subsidy administered by the act of March 3, 1891, which, while it is not the first hyperdermic administered to the merchant marine, has, like the subsidy voted to the Collins Line in 1850, to the Brazilian Line in 1864, and to the Pacific Line in 1869, proven to be an abject and dismal failure, at the same time entailing upon the Treasury an increasing burden and resulting in a decreasing merchant marine; although the advocates of the passage of the act of March 3, 1891, then asserted that its passage would effect a complete rehabilitation of our merchant marine, as evidenced by the statement of Mr. Dingley in his address to the House, in which he said:

> At the end of the tenth year there is little doubt that we should have in the foreign trade a new merchant marine of 800,000 to 1,000,000 tons, composed largely of first-class iron and steel steamships, built as auxiliary cruisers.

How far this prediction is sustained by the facts we have only to consult the report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1909, in which it appears that in 1891 we had 1,516 registered vessels engaged in foreign trade, of 988,719 gross tons, while in 1909 we had 1,600 registered vessels of 878,532 gross tons, in which latter are included some vessels which have outlived their usefulness and will never again go to sea, but still maintain their registers. After a test of this act of nineteen years' duration, during which time approximately $28,000,000 have been expended by reason of its enactment, not a single ship of the class it was designed to put into commission has been added to our merchant marine since 1895, and our foreign carrying trade has decreased every year since its passage.

Ships that came within the scope of this bill, and that did fly the American flag, since its passage have taken them down and have run up foreign flags in their stead. Such object lessons as these should in themselves be sufficient to stop any further raid on the Treasury along this line at least. How those of you who are committed to the subsidy policy as outlined by the bill offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, can hope or expect different results, so far as its subsidy features are concerned, to follow its passage, when its only effect is to pay the slow ships classified therein more money for the same service they are now rendering to the Government at less cost is beyond my comprehension. The effect of the amendment contained in the first section of the bill is to place a premium on slow service, whereas there is sharper rivalry to-day than ever before for faster service in both mail and passenger lines. It has always been my understanding that one of the principal, if not the sole, objects for subsidy, has been and is that it would enable us to secure faster service, in order that we might successfully compete with the faster foreign ships. Voting subsidy has been justified and defended on the ground that the Government could afford to offer and pay premiums for fast service.

The ocean carrying trade has advanced and undergone changes in like proportion as overland trade and transportation have. It would be as sensible to subsidize an old-fashioned stagecoach to enable it to compete with the modern-day railroad as to undertake to subsidize some of the ships that are classified in the proposed bill and expect them to successfully compete with ships of the Lusitania and Mauretania type. In other words, I say to those of you who are committed to the policy of voting the money in the Treasury that has been raised by taxing all the people to aid the private business of a few people, because they represent to you that they are unable to conduct a paying business and that therefore the public revenues should be used to assist them, that the bill that you have offered, so far as the subsidy features are concerned, will only result in paying out more millions in less time uselessly and to no good purpose.

If, having the power to pass this bill, and you have it, you have definitely made up your minds to do so and thereby take from the people's pockets their money and donate it to those individuals who state to you that they are doing a losing business, and it is for this reason alone that they make the request, then draft your bill so as to take the last cent from the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Why? Because if you intend to attempt to regain supremacy by subsidy in the ocean carrying trade, your subsidies must be equal to or larger than the largest subsidies now paid by the nation having that supremacy, and of such magnitude and so prodigal as to cover the alleged increase in the cost of American-built ships—the increased cost of operating them under the American flag—and at the same time you will do well to keep steadfastly in mind the fact that you are undertaking to supplant, yes, to take the occupation of those who now have an established trade in this line of business away from them. You are in the attitude of the new merchant who is undertaking to supplant an old-established firm that has for years given reasonable satisfaction to its patrons.

Much stress is laid on the statement that subsidy is required in order to overcome the increased cost of shipbuilding in American yards and the increased cost of operating ships after they have been placed in commission. While I shall not dispute the existence of either of these conditions, I am somewhat curious to know, if this is a fact, how those who are wedded to the subsidy scheme hope to regain and dominate the ocean carrying trade by voting less susidy than either England, France, Germany, or Italy—the nations now in control of the ocean trade—when you contend that all of them are able to construct ships of equal tonnage and speed and operate them cheaper than we can, and at the same time secure larger subsidies from their respective governments than you are proposing. It occurs to me that if the statement is true you must not only vote subsidies as liberal for ships of like tonnage and speed as the foreign ships, but that your subsidy must be larger, so as to cover the increased fixed charges embraced both in construction and operation before you are on equal footing with the foreign ship, else you are in the attitude of backing by taxation a losing private business with no hope of ever putting it upon a sound or paying business by this means."

In other words, your subsidy must be equal to the highest foreign subsidy plus the per cent of the increased cost of construction plus the increased cost of operation.

If this increased cost of construction and operation, both of which do operate to our disadvantage, is the result of legislation, then it would appear that this legislation is the root of the evil and that the proper and the best beginning that could be made, looking to the end desired, would be to repeal this legislation at once. At this point it may not be irrelevant to inquire how it happens that we can build locomotives, make steel rails, armor plate and structural steel, and successfully compete in the markets of the world, and into which materials the same elements of cost enter as into shipbuilding materials. We use the same coal and iron from the same mines, employ the same-priced labor to mine both and to convert them into finished products. Stranger still when there are not lacking instances where our alleged high-priced ship material has been purchased by foreign ship builders to construct the alleged cheap foreign ship.

I have heard of certain plants that could not run if certain presidential candidates were elected to office; of certain railroads that could not operate unless the rates were increased; of certain manufacturers that would have to close down unless they were given more protection; and I have a suspicion that amounts almost to a conviction that this subsidy grab is a part of the same system. [Applause.]

Let no one infer from or be deceived by the arguments of those who favor subsidy into believing that there is a congestion of over-sea freight at the ports on our seaboard awaiting transportation—there are more ships there than there are cargoes with which to load them—nor be misled into the erroneous conclusion that our foreign or export trade has not been increasing annually; that there is any complaint from any source that the rates charged for ocean freight are excessive in the least. On the contrary, there are numerous instances where cargoes are carried free, and some instances where the ship companies pay the shippers for the privilege of carrying the cargo. So that, with this situation facing you, your proposition is not so much one to create new business as it will be to take the other party's business away from him in this branch of trade, which is now suffering from overcompetition. In ocean carrying trade you are confronted with the same rules as obtain in the transportation by rail, where the shipper always sends his freight over the lines offering the most satisfactory accommodations at the lowest rates. The flag on the ship has about as much to do with the one proposition as the color of the car has to do with the other. In fact, no one can or will try to show or even contend that the object of subsidy is to make rates cheaper.

The present Speaker of the House photographed the subsidy scheme fairly well on February 28, 1879, when discussing a similar proposition then before the House, although I regret to say that for some reason satisfactory to himself he has since turned the picture he then made to the wall. [Laughter and applause.]

I quote him:

Now, what is this proposition? Oh, it is to give John Roach $3,000,000 as a practical gratuity and to charge that as a tax on the cotton, the provisions, and tobacco, and wheat, and grain, and breadstuffs, and oils that we produce. What for? To enable somebody to sell something that he has made which it cost $1.43 to make here, while it cost only $1 to make it in Europe, and both manufacturers have to go to the same market, namely, Brazil. Why, gentlemen, if you had a business agent who proposed to do your private business in that way you would put him into a lunatic asylum or swear that he was a thief or an idiot and discharge him.

Continuing, he said:

Commencing in the year 1847, and down to the present time, 1879, act after act has been passed for similar purposes—postal subsidies. I hold in my hand the official statement of the Secretary of the Navy and the Postmaster-General, which shows the payment of subsidies to the amount, in round numbers, of $14,500,000 to steamship lines during the period from the year 1848 to 1858. I hold in my hand a statement that shows that subsidies to the amount of $7,000,000, in round numbers, since that time, making over $21,000,000, have been paid out of the Treasury for the establishment of steamship lines. Seven million dollars would buy all the steamships engaged in commerce that sail under the American flag, in every ocean of the world; and more than that, the subsidizing of these lines, from the Collins Line in 1852 up to the present, 1879, has bankrupted every public man that has favored it.

Subsidy is no safer or saner scheme now than when these words were spoken by the present occupant of the chair; no more honest now than then, nor is it any more worthy of employment now than then, especially since the effect of the act of March 3, 1891, only serves to furnish cumulative evidence of the failure of like legislation, and which act has taken out of the Treasury, approximately, $28,000,000, and our carrying trade is now far less than when the above statement that I have just quoted was made.

I have endeavored, so far, to show how all efforts of Congress to rehabilitate our merchant marine by means of subsidy have failed, and I believe that all future efforts by such means will prove as ineffective for that purpose. There is no branch of business in which there are involved as many underlying complex conditions. It has stubbornly refused to advance on the one crutch—subsidy.

While we may never regain the position we once occupied in the ocean carrying trade, I believe it possible to regain it in a large measure if we will go at the proposition in good faith and in the right manner. I believe that the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN] in the main presents the proper course to pursue for that purpose. It contains no subsidy feature whatever. Yet he produced to the House abundant and conclusive evidence from a perfect cloud of witnesses who had had extended practical experience in the business that if his bill should become a law it would restore the American flag to the sea. Certainly the utter failure of the present law, as well as those of the past, to do so by subsidy ought to establish the fact finally and conclusively that it can not be done in the manner that has been attempted. As stated by the present Speaker of the House, in his address of 1879:

Act after act has been passed for similar purposes * * * that up to the present time has bankrupted every public man that has favored it.

A study of this branch of business or trade will disclose the indisputable fact that the country which can float and man the best ships at the least cost is the country that has always been able to command the largest volume of the ocean carrying trade. Unquestionably the history of our own merchant marine has demonstrated this proposition. We only need to refer to the period of the wooden ship, which we constructed the cheapest and the best, to justify this statement, for it was at that time that we were commanding the ocean trade. It is the inevitable law of trade in an open market that the man who can perform the best service or offer the best values at the lowest cost is the person who will always secure the largest amount of business to do. The oceans are the world's highways, and the right of way is free to all comers, and all are welcome, and in the rivalry for its trade it is preeminently the sphere in which the survival of the fittest obtains. If, then, you are in good faith and honest in your efforts to build up our merchant marine, and if, as you contend, it costs more to build as well as to operate an American-built ship, our plain duty is to repeal the law that forbids an American citizen who has bought a foreign-built ship from flying the American flag from the peak of the ship.

If you really desire to see more American flags in the ports and harbors of the world, give the American the opportunity to purchase the cheaper ship with which to ply his trade, and let him place the American flag on it. Permit the American seaman to reduce his fixed charges to the point where he can successfully compete with foreign rivals and competitors. As our laws stand to-day, an American citizen can buy a foreign-built ship, put the American flag on it, and trade with all the countries of the world except his own; but he can put a foreign flag on it and be permitted to enter the ports of his own country. Under such legislative restrictions as these is there anything astonishing in the fact that American citizens or capital, looking to the ocean carrying trade, buy their ships where they can buy the cheapest, and operate them under that flag and in the way that they can the cheapest after they have bought them? It is purely a business proposition with the seafaring trader. He is in the business to make money, and he can make money by flying the foreign flag; hence it follows that there are vast sums of American capital invested by American citizens in a large number of vessels flying foreign flags, who, I have every reason to believe, would, the instant these laws were repealed, take down the foreign flag and place the American flag in its stead. In support of this I submit the following list taken from a report of the Commissioner of Navigation:

Thus it would appear that by simply repealing the superannuated and restrictive features of our navigation laws prohibiting American registry of foreign-built ships, we could at once emancipate from foreign flags 136 vessels now owned by American citizens, and thereby add a total gross tonnage equal almost to the present registered tonnage of our merchant marine, all of which could be accomplished without any charge whatever upon the Treasury. Should the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN] be enacted into law, every one of the 136 vessels above mentioned would become eligible to American registration, and consequently permitted to fly the American flag. If, however, the bill offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] and reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and which has the approval of the administration, is passed, then 21 of the ships enumerated in the above list would be denied registration, because their gross tonnage is less than 2,500 gross tons, this being the minimum tonnage for foreign-built vessels subject to registry as defined by that bill; and, in my opinion, it is an unwise provision. The smaller vessels can get into the shallow harbors, pick up the cargoes, carry them to the important harbors as the branch lines feed the trunk lines in the operation of railroads. I fail to see any valid reason for this restriction in that bill. I am also favorably impressed with the section of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN] which removes the restriction as to the employment of American seamen on our registered vessels engaged in foreign trade. There may be, and is merit in requiring the employment of only Americans on vessels immediately under the control of the navy.

It occurs to me that foreign labor could be employed with as much propriety on our vessels engaged solely in trade as that it may be employed in the variety of ways that it is employed on shore—certainly with as much consistency as it is employed in the construction of the Panama Canal. In this connection it might be well enough to bear in mind that the law of the port and not the law of the flag governs the scale of wages. Expressed somewhat plainer, American registered vessels and foreign registered vessels in the same port obtain their crews at the same scale of wages. A close examination of the law will reveal the fact that the master of an American registered vessel may engage seamen or crews out of the United States in places where there is a consul or commercial agent, and that they may be engaged there either for a round trip or a definite time, whatever the destination of the ship. This renders the law easy of circumvention, and if its rigid enforcement works to our disadvantage it should be repealed, as I think the entire proposition is abundantly safeguarded by officering the American trade ships with American officers. Certainly, in view of our waning ocean carrying trade, it stands us in hand to remove any and all obstacles that have resulted from unfavorable legislation in the past, and if for this reason we have fallen behind in the race for this class of trade, let us remove the handicap with all possible haste. If we are discriminated against in the matter of insurance or in the management of bonded warehouses, let us adopt such measures, if possible, as will relieve the situation. What is there so sacred about an American trading vessel that no one but an American citizen can own an interest in it, however small?

We have everything to gain and nothing to lose by decreasing the duties laid on all goods imported in American ships. So long as we are carrying so small a per cent of the exports and imports we can well afford to make it profitable for foreigners and importers to use American ships. Besides, this would be in the nature of a little revision downward. This would operate to stimulate American shipbuilding and shipping enterprise. Of course this can not be done so long as the party now in power controls legislation. You would not yield one ounce of protection for a thousand tons of the ocean carrying trade. You will do well, however, to note the fact that as the tariff rate has risen the tonnage of our merchant marine has fallen. Considering the extent of unfavorable legislation on this subject, it is a matter of wonder that we have even a remnant of our merchant marine left; its decline dating back, as it does, to the time of the civil war, when a large per cent of our tonnage was destroyed, either by acts of war or transferred to foreign flags to avoid war risks and escape destruction at a time when our entire business system was completely demoralized, and when our cheap wooden ships were compelled to give way to the English iron and steel ships, which latter type England could then construct cheaper than we could. Just at this period the countries of Europe, beginning to feel the effect of congestion, both as to population and business, all branches and avenues of their domestic trade becoming fully supplied, were consequently driven to the sea to seek trade in the foreign markets, and steamship lines were as essential to the commercial life of Europe as our transcontinental railroads have been to our domestic development—in fact, their steamship lines were more vital to them by reason of their widely scattered colonial dependencies and military and naval stations.

On the contrary what was our situation at that time? The very conditions that operated to force them to the sea were the very forces that militated against the upbuilding of our merchant marine; or perhaps more accurately speaking, that have been partially instrumental in causing its decline. At this time we had no colonies, no military or naval stations abroad, demanding support from home. The States that formed the western banks of the Mississippi were virtually the frontiers; now there is no frontier. Since then that vast domain between the Mississippi and the Pacific has undergone the most wonderful development ever known to the world. To effect this development, which has been and still is an attractive field for investment, together with the unprecedented growth of the country east of the Mississippi, the available capital of our country has been well-nigh absorbed.

Bearing in mind that ocean traffic involves the investment of unusually large capital, when we stop to consider the fact that since the time that I have been referring to there has been constructed and are now more miles of railroad in the United States than in all Europe, Asia, and Africa combined; the great number of magnificent cities that have sprung into existence here; that there is hardly a village in the United States that is not reached by wire; the development of our vast coal properties, as well as of iron and its varied finished products; gold, silver, and copper mining, manufactures, banking, and agricultural pursuits, all of which have grown with remarkable rapidity since the period that I have referred to, and all being attractive and tempting fields for investment, in that they are safe and remunerative to such an extent that they have not only absorbed American capital, but have been the inducement to bring vast sums of foreign capital here for investment—I ask, when you stop to consider all these conditions and such opportunities as these at our very doors, is it in anywise strange that our merchant marine should have lagged behind and declined as it has, especially since it has been hampered by our unwise navigation laws?

The hazard attending investments in ocean-going property is far in excess of that attending investments on land, and this hazard was greater formerly than now. Capital is proverbially timid, hence the thoughtful and reflective person can see at a glance why our domestic development has outstripped the perilous avocation of the sea. We have not been under the necessity of cultivating a foreign market for the output of our industrial plants. There has been no acute situation demanding ocean lines, and our development at home has completely overshadowed the possibilities of trade abroad. Who is there here present who would exchange this phenomenal development, which has made our country the world's supply house, for England's supremacy upon the sea? The unlimited resources that resulted from developments here are to-day our danger signals to the world, and are to-day a more effective protection to our Government than England's navy is to her or Germany's army to her. The catchy argument that is advanced in defense of subsidy, namely, that it would be the means of constructing an auxiliary to the navy, does not appeal to me. As for me, it gives the proposition no weight or color whatever. Besides I fail to see that vessels capable of making only 16 and 14 knots an hour could render any considerable service to a fleet of battle ships making 20 knots per hour. Either the auxiliary ships need to be as fast as the fleet or the fleet as slow as the auxiliaries. If more colliers and transports are necessary for the efficiency of our navy, I am perfectly willing that they should be built. Admiral Dewey and Rear-Admiral Robley D. Evans ought to be authority on matters pertaining to the navy, and both are on record as stating that our navy is not inefficient for the lack of either. Nor am I impressed with the contention that these so-called "auxiliaries" are needed as a nursery for the navy.

The report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1909 shows that the merchant marine of the United States, including all kinds of documented shipping, comprised 25,688 vessels; also that there were 180,962 seamen shipped and reshipped last year, and that of this number about 90,000 were American citizens, which strikes me as a reasonably large-sized kindergarten, sufficient for all present purposes at least. The war cry has always been a serviceable theme to extract money from the Treasury. I am not so eager for trade as to acquire it either by duress or force, or by the acquisition of colonies, possession of which is contrary to the letter and spirit of our Constitution, and which carry with them the necessity for an abnormally large army and navy, which, besides possessing an element of danger to our country, entail a stupendous burden upon our Government for their maintenance. Until within the last ten years that clause of the Declaration of Independence that proclaimed that "Government derives all of its just powers from the consent of the governed" was the cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night that guided the course of those who legislated in the Halls of Congress before this Government was converted into part republic and part empire. Nor do I subscribe to that course or policy that would convert this Government into a gigantic pawnbroker's shop in order to acquire trade—I do not think we are materially improving our trade relations with Central and South America by attempting to put men selected at Washington in control of the governments of certain of these countries. In my opinion, it will require something more than subsidy to overcome the adverse feeling engendered by our present policy in that zone of the Western Hemisphere, which should be our best market. I am apprehensive that the good effect of former Secretary Root's visit to the Central and South American Republics, looking to the closer and more cordial relationships with these governments, has been largely discounted by our more recent domineering policy there.

I fear some blunders and mistakes have been made. That quarter of the globe is on the eve of great development, from which we are in position to reap some of the benefits, and I surely believe that the Root policy will yield us better returns than the coercive policy. The truth is that we are not as adept in cultivating and securing a demand for our manufactured products from the foreign trade as we might have been were it not for the fact that until comparatively recent years we have not felt the necessity of securing this foreign-trade outlet, so completely have the output of our plants been absorbed by the home market, at prices higher than the open market affords, by reason of our tariff laws. It has always been more profitable for our manufacturers to sell at home in the protected market. We need not think to regain this lost ground by resorting to subsidy, which from my point of view, besides being wrong in principle, in that if private enterprise is unprofitable the Government must sustain it, if losses are sustained the Government must pay them, will not build up our foreign trade. At present there is a subsidized line to Venezuela, and our trade with it is on the decrease. Here is an instance where subsidy has not and does not create trade. Human nature is about the same the world over. As the American will always undertake to procure that which he is compelled to obtain abroad at the best bargain counter, so in order to get the foreigner to spend his money here it is equally important that we should make an exhibition of some bargains for them on our counters. It is but natural that they, like ourselves, will endeavor to secure the best values at the least cost. Our tariff laws have made this a dear market, and it is only such manufactured articles as can not be obtained elsewhere that we are able, in quantities proportionately large, to place in the markets of the countries mentioned. It is as unreasonable for us to expect the foreigner to purchase in a protected market where the seller insists on his profits that arise by operation of law, as it is to expect the individual to do his shopping at the highest-priced store in any given locality.

Again, there are Members here who have made the statement on this floor that if they had it in their power to prevent it, they would not permit a single article to be imported into the United States that can be manufactured here. Are these men in position to complain of our inability to get our surplus disposed of in the foreign market, or much less to vote subsidy to that end? It is therefore nothing more than should be expected from the countries south of us, where we spend vast sums for their commodities, that the proceeds of these transactions should find their way to the cheaper European markets. We need to consult the tastes, styles, and fashions of these people, which differ widely and radically from ours, and which are as fixed in this regard as ours are, and they must be conformed to. To get their trade we must at least have what they want before we can sell them. As long as we do not consult their pleasure in these matters we will make slow progress gaining their trade, regardless of the amount of subsidy we may spend in the attempt. Our methods of business must be adapted more to their usages. Our goods must be shipped in such condition that it will be possible to get them to their destination by their means of transportation. In most instances in these countries the pack mule and the bridle path serve the purposes of our locomotives and steel railways. The commercial agent there is as indispensable as the traveling salesman here. Our lack of banking facilities there to offer sufficient indulgence in the way of credits has operated against us.

The report of the Commissioner of Navigation shows that we have three subsidized lines on the Caribbean route, and the full, complete, and final answer to all argument in support of subsidy as a trade producer is that, notwithstanding these subsidized lines, our trade in that sphere has decreased instead of increased. Yet, in the face of these stubborn facts, the bill reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries represents a fixed and determined effort on your part to take additional millions from the Treasury, ostensibly for ocean mail service, at a time when there is a deficit of over $17,000,000 in the receipts of the Post-Office Department, the largest in its history. I am unalterably opposed to subsidy in any of its phases, and am unwilling to increase this present deficit at a time when the revenues are falling behind the expenditures, and at a time when there is a universal cry coming up from the people asking relief from the burdens of taxation. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I now yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I shall address myself to the rural delivery feature of this bill. This service began in 1897, and at the close of the current fiscal year it will have lasted fourteen years. During that time it has grown at the rate of 2,935 routes a year, and an average annual increase of about $2,637,864, and the appropriation for this service for the current year was $37,360,000.

The following tables show the beginning and growth of this service, the number of counties in the various States, and the number having complete rural delivery service:

[a] Apparent discrepancies between the figures in this column and in the corresponding column headed "Carriers" in previous annual reports are due to figures having been taken for periods other than fiscal years.

[b] Maximum salary of carriers increased from $600 to $720 per annum.

[c] Maximum salary of carriers increased from $720 to $900 per annum.

In my judgment Rural Free-Delivery Service has given perhaps greater satisfaction to the American people than any other branch of the postal service, or at least greater satisfaction to that large class of our citizens who live in the country districts and do not have the many advantages of city life. After growing for all these years continuously, without the slightest let-up, until it is now serving about 18,000,000 people, with 41,103 routes, it is practically proposed to stop the service; to dole out to the 26 additional millions who live in the country sections of our land $285,000, which the pending bill carries, to extend a service which, since its inception fourteen years ago, has received an average annual increase of $2,637,864.

It seems to me that it is very unfair to adopt any such policy as this at this time. If it be necessary to curtail expenses and economize, I will gladly assist in doing so in many branches of the public service, which a lack of time prevents me enumerating. But certainly, my friends, this is a bad time, and it is bad policy to begin retrenchment with the bone and sinew of our land—the sturdy farmers. [Applause.] One of the crying evils of this day is the fact that country people are flocking into the cities. Another of our great evils is the high cost of living. You do not pick up a paper without reading something about the high cost of living. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, one of the most potent factors of this increased cost is the fact that the country people, the great producers of all food products, are leaving the country and going into the city, thereby increasing the number of consumers and reducing the number of producers. It is our business so to legislate as to encourage the people to go into the country, rather than leave the country, and nothing has encouraged country people to be satisfied with their lot more than the Rural Free-Delivery Service. [Applause.]

Let us see now what is the proposition. The Post-Office Department suggests that there be no appropriation at this time for the extension of this service. The Post-Office Committee recommends an increase of about $285,000, and I believe that there is to be a surplus of some $245,000, so that at the beginning of the next fiscal year we will have to expend for this service in new routes the sum of $530,000.

The Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, who has this service in charge, testified before the Post-Office Committee that on the 1st day of July next there will have been examined and approved and ready for installation 2,037 routes. Later in his testimony he said that 977 routes were now pending in his office, approved and ready for installation; that 672 applications had been examined and were now in the field to be inspected, of which 376, at least, would be approved by July 1; that in addition thereto there would be at least 900 petitions for routes presented to his office and inspected before the 1st of July, of which he estimated that about 337 would be approved; so there would be on the 1st of July next 1,690 routes approved and ready for installation. Yet, in spite of that fact, he says we must not give any money to extend the service.

Notwithstanding that fact, this great Post-Office Committee of ours propose to make available the pitiful sum of $285,000 in this bill, plus the balance on hand of $245,000, equal to $530,000 in all, well knowing, as they do, that 1,690 routes, by one of Mr. De Graw's computations, and 2,037 routes, by another computation, will be pending in the department approved and ready for installation on the 1st of July next, well knowing also that each route costs an average of $869.94, and well knowing that to install these 1,690 routes will cost $1,470,298. Now, I would like to know by what process of reasoning they arrived at the fact that they should add $285,000 for the extension of these routes to the $245,000 already on hand? What is to become of the balance of these routes? What is to happen to those who are not so fortunate as to get in? Is it fair, is it just, is it reasonable, I say, after carrying on this service for fourteen years, establishing 41,103 routes, serving an average of 450 persons each, equal to 18,496,400 people; is it fair to stop the growth of this service now and not extend it to the remaining 26,000,000 citizens who live in the country?

The Census Department estimates that about one-half of the American people reside in the rural districts, and that our present population is 89,000,000. That would give us something like 44,500,000 living in the country. We are now giving rural service to 18,496,400 of them, hence there are over 26,000,000 people not receiving it. I repeat that in that state of facts it is certainly incomprehensible to me that the committee should have taken the stand it did in this matter, and I honestly hope it will recede from that position and consent to an increase of not less than $1,500,000.

Let me state it briefly again, because it is a common-sense business proposition. Paying no attention to the great number of routes which doubtless will be examined and approved during the next year, during the year for which we are now legislating—and, mind you, we are not legislating for the current year, but for the year ending June 30, 1911—paying no attention to the large number of routes which will be approved during that year, we will have barely money enough on the 1st of July to establish one-third of the routes approved and ready for installation at that time. How can you go before these 26,000,000 farmers, these men who are undoubtedly the bone and sinew of this land, and defend your position in giving only one-third of the money necessary to establish these 1,690 approved routes and making no provision for those that are to come hereafter?

My friends, I feel rather deeply on this subject. It is a great business question and demands the most careful consideration. Many of you have nearly complete service. I have before me a table showing the number of routes in every State in the Union and in every county in the Union. That table contains, among other things, the showing, for instance, that in Illinois, with 102 counties, there are 90 counties with complete service. In Indiana there are 92 counties, of which 86 have complete service. Iowa, with 99 counties, has 96 counties with complete service. And so I might go down the list. There are 2,934 counties in the Union, of which 849 have complete service, leaving 2,075 counties with incomplete service, and a great many of them have not a single rural free-delivery route. There are a number of counties in my congressional district that have not a single rural route. Why? Do I charge unfairness in the administration of this law? Not at all. I believe our Post-Office Department is a great business institution and that it has been magnificently administered.

The great trouble in my district has been sparseness of population and inferior roads. People are beginning to flock into that district now. Its citizens are getting aroused to the importance of good roads. Under the leadership of our very able and energetic young governor, Jared Y. Sanders, the good-roads movement is having a big boom in Louisiana, and we are going to be knocking at the doors of Congress from now on to get for Louisiana her share of the rural free-delivery service, which has been such a blessing to so many people in the Republic. [Applause.] My friends, you who have complete service, who have, some of you, 250 to 300 routes in your districts, as compared with 51 routes in mine, are you going to play the dog in the manger and say, "I have been served; I have all I need; I care nothing for you?" I can not believe that the great men who constitute the Post-Office Committee have intended to do anything of that kind, and far from me to charge it to them, but that is the effect of it.

If you do not carry on this work to which the Government is thoroughly and fully committed by fourteen years of continuous, rapidly growing service, certainly the people who have not received the service will be justified in saying that those who have gotten it are dogs in the manger not to give it to the rest of the country. The question is not a political one, and I am not treating it as such, but the party in power will be held responsible.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know how many routes will be established if we get the $30,000 which, it seems, will be carried in the bill, together with the surplus. I do know that the increase for Rural Free-Delivery Service in the last bill was a little over $1,400,000, and with that $1,400,000 available for the extension of Rural Free-Delivery Service we have had only 475 new routes established. It is true that $245,000 of that sum are on hand. Now, I wish some one would tell us why it is that with $245,000 on hand to the credit of rural service and 977 routes approved and ready for installation, they are not establishing them. Why do they wait? Why do they refuse to install the 7 routes in my congressional district in Louisiana, which were approved and ready some time ago? Why do they keep them waiting? Why do they keep approved routes waiting in all other congressional districts in this land to the extent of 957? Why keep them waiting? Echo answers, Why! You can not get a satisfactory answer out of the Post-Office Department, and the chairman of this committee, in response to my question, failed to give one.

Gentlemen, in my judgment, there is nothing for which Congress appropriates money that appeals more forcibly to the people of the rural districts, that appeals to all our citizens, than these sums for the Rural Free-Delivery Service.

I had an instance recently which is worth relating. In one of the principal towns of my district a venerable old man approached me on my last visit there and was most extravagant in his praises of me for securing him a route past his home. He said:

Mr. RANSDELL, I am under the deepest obligations to you, sir, and to our great Government for giving me that rural route. My only son and my daughter had become so discontented on the farm that they had made up their minds to leave their home and go to the city. About that time the rural free-delivery service of the mail was established there. They subscribed at once for some daily papers, and the road had to be improved before they could get the route, and they were enabled to keep up with what was going on in the world, as well as folks in the city. They could travel about with ease on the good roads that were necessitated by the route; they had easy means of communication with their neighbors; and they became happy and contented as the immediate result of the establishment of that rural route.

[Applause.]

The experience of those people can be related, I have no doubt, in the true history of every one of the 41,103 routes in this land.

Gentlemen, I appeal to you, do not embitter the 26,000,000 of country people who do not have the blessings of this splendid mail service with the thought that they are not just as good, just as dearly beloved children of the national father as those already served so effectively and so well by 41,103 routes now in existence.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield to an interruption?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. As the bill abundantly provides for the fellow who lives in the city under all conceivable conditions, does not the gentleman feel that a corresponding benefit should be given to the fellow who lives in the country, and carry his mail to his door?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I do beyond any question. I think every citizen of the Republic should, as near as possible, be placed on equal terms, and unless you do that you are going to hear from the country people beyond any question. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BOUTELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5787. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make allotment to Frank H. Pequette;

S. 5788. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make allotments within national forests;

S. 1408. An act to extend the provisions of the existing bounty land laws to the officers and enlisted men and the officers and men of the boat companies of the Florida Seminole Indian war;

S. 5287. An act to parole juvenile offenders;

S. 6089. An act to correct the military record of Edward D. Gilbert;

S. 6166. An act for the relief of R. B. Whitacre & Co.; and

S. 193. An act for the relief of James D. Elliott.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in 1896 I first began to take an active part in politics. At that time the Democratic party was carrying on a campaign based on the contention that prices were too low; that wheat worth a dollar a bushel was selling for but 50 cents a bushel; that other products were proportionately cheap; and that 4 per cent of the people had entered into a conspiracy to enslave the other 96 per cent by the simple device of artificially lowering prices. The disease was to be cured, according to you gentlemen on the other side, by splitting the dollar in half and calling it $2. Now you tell us that 4 per cent of the people are endeavoring to enslave the other 96 per cent by artificially raising prices. A strange about-face from your former views that low prices help the rich man to grow richer.

Some of you Democrats the other day were convicted of ignorance of Thomas Jefferson's principles and writings. Well, Jefferson lived a long time ago, and perhaps you may be excused for your lapse of memory; but I have here a more modern production—your party bible of the year 1896. Out of it I shall cite passages which I hope will convince you of the utter inconsistency and vacillation of your faith. I hope that you are still familiar with Coin's Financial School.

You tell us to-day that the tariff is responsible for the rise of prices. Let us see what you said in 1896. Turn to page 85 of your party bible and read:

But—

Said Coin—

we are trying to get at what is the main or underlying cause of our present industrial demoralization, and tariff pro and con will not account for it. Our decline in values has been going on steadily and persistently since the demonetization of silver. During that period we have had different tariff bills, and of late years a very high tariff schedule, and yet it has had no effect in stopping the fall of prices.

So we see that in 1896, when it suited your purpose, the tariff was not supposed to affect prices.

Now, turn to page 119, and find out how you proved that the money sharks thrive on low prices and then compare the syllogism with your new argument by which you show that the money sharks thrive on high prices.

Best of all, read this passage on page 143:

When it is considered that we are giving $2 worth of property now in payment for $1 in gold, you will realize that we are now paying 100 per cent premium on gold.

Well, I confess that it is hard to satisfy you. In 1896 you said that prices were just half what they ought to be and now you shed tears like crocodiles in their native swamps because prices have risen.

But the inconsistencies of the Democratic party are only amusing. A serious situation confronts us.

HIGH COST OF LIVING IN UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

Throughout this country, far and wide, our urban population is demanding to know the reason for the high price of food products. Not only is this the case in this high-tariff country of ours, but in comparatively low-tariff Canada an equally acrimonious debate is in progress. I hold in my hand clipping upon clipping from Canadian newspapers, and I notice a singular resemblance to our own situation in that of our northern neighbors. Nobody is willing to acknowledge that he has got away with the goods. In Canada, as in the United States, the farmer puts the responsibility on the retailer or on the wholesaler or on the high rate of wages. Retailers, wholesalers, and industrial combinations hasten to turn their pockets inside out while they plead extreme poverty and sharply rebuke for their rapacity the farmer or the wage-earner or each other.

There, as here, many persons believe that the increased production of gold has decreased the purchasing power of money, while others insist that the prosperity of the consumer has raised prices in response to the prodigious demand.

There is, however, one significant difference between the dispute in Canada and the dispute here at home. No one in Canada credits the high prices of food to the tariff, for the very good reason that such a charge would hardly hold good in a comparatively low-tariff country.

COMMISSION OF INVESTIGATION FAVORED.

Personally, I do not believe that the high tariff in the United States has raised the price of food products, except in so far as it has brought us extreme prosperity; but, if the tariff is indeed responsible, I wish to know it. If it is so, I wish to face that fact just as I wish to face the fact if the responsibility rests with the farmer, or with the trusts, or with the wage-earner, or with the middleman.

I do not desire to legislate in ignorance of the facts any more than I should care in case of illness to undergo a surgical operation until my disease had been fully diagnosed.

We know that the prices of food products are high, and we know that that fact is a hardship, although we do not agree as to the cause. In exactly the same way, many of us have often been aware that we were physically suffering from pains of whose origin we were ignorant.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I should prefer to yield after I have finished stating my proposition.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It was just on that point. I do not wish to disturb the gentleman. The gentleman's language was that the tariff was not responsible in the least for the high prices in the United States.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No; that is not correct. The gentleman will find my exact language in the RECORD to the effect that it is not responsible for the high cost of living. Now, I will ask the gentleman not to interrupt me until I am through stating my proposition.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Very well. I was trying to quote the gentleman's language. I understood him to say that.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. As I was saying, perhaps we may have suspected our trouble to be appendicitis. Nevertheless, we did not at once lay ourselves on the operating table until we were quite sure that the seat of our trouble was our appendix and not merely our table of contents.

Personally, I should like to see an investigation into the price of food products conducted by a commission appointed by the President. I should like to see noted political economists appointed upon that commission, although I realize perfectly well that college professors, as a rule, are by no means in favor of a high tariff. I believe, however, that political economists are generally profound analysts and that they are and can afford to be perfectly impartial.

Now, do not understand me as opposing an investigation by Congress if an investigation by a commission is impracticable. Do not imagine for a moment that I have anything in sympathy with those harpies who befoul their own national nest by insinuating that the people's representatives are untrustworthy. Untrustworthy we are not. It is the timidity inherent in our situation which I fear. No matter what a congressional committee reports, that committee is sure to be bespattered with the offal hurled by the demagogue, unless, perchance, its report roasts on the gridiron that part of the community which has the fewest votes.

TARIFF NOT RESPONSIBLE.

It is my purpose this afternoon to prove, so far as in me lies, that the tariff is by no means responsible for the high price of foodstuffs; but in order, so far as possible, to simplify the argument, I propose to state at the outset two propositions, which I believe should be conceded at once by all fair-minded men, whether protectionists or free traders: First, I regard it as self-evident that the tariff increases the price to the American consumer of all staple nonperishable articles, the like of which are sold abroad at a price substantially lower than that demanded for the same articles of American production. It is obvious that under free-trade conditions those articles could be sold here in the United States at the foreign price plus the cost of transportation and intermediate profits. Second, conversely, I regard it as self-evident that the tariff can not increase the price to the American consumer of any staple article, perishable or nonperishable, which we sell abroad in large quantities at a price as high or higher than that which we could obtain at home for the same product.

I expect to show this House that the rise in the price of food products is world-wide, in free-trade England as in protectionist America, and that since the enactment of the Payne bill prices have risen on most articles, whether that measure raised the duty, lower the duty, or left it unchanged. I expect to show this House that for thirty years the course of wholesale prices in free-trade England has kept parallel with the course of wholesale prices in protectionist America, even in spite of the fact that in those thirty years we have had every sort of tariff from the high Republican Dingley and McKinley tariffs down to the disastrously low Democratic Wilson tariff.

If these premises can be established your whole theory of tariff responsibility for high prices of food products falls at once to the ground.

I expect to show you that most of our foodstuffs are exported in vast quantities, and that they find a ready sale in foreign lands at prices as high or higher than can be obtained at home. If that be the fact, free trade in those articles could not lower the price here, for none could be imported with advantage.

Clearly, no one would export to us articles for which a better price could be obtained elsewhere.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall proceed with the explanation of my charts and tables of prices. I am perfectly ready to yield to all legitimate interruptions which may be necessary in order to attain a clear understanding, but I am not willing to concede the floor for people to make short stump speeches in the time allotted to me.

WHOLESALE PRICES IN UNITED STATES AND ABROAD.

So far as I know, there have been no tables prepared showing the movement of world's prices since 1901, when the task was undertaken by the United States Industrial Commission. The table then prepared, although out of date, is extremely significant and interesting. It may be found on page 38 of volume 19 of the commission's report to Congress. It shows by means of index numbers the course of wholesale prices from 1878 to 1901 in the United States, Great Britain, and Germany. The table for the United States was prepared by Prof. John R. Commons, now of the University of Wisconsin, a gentleman who, if he is not a free trader, is very near to it; the table for Great Britain was prepared by Augustus Sauerbeck, statistician for the Royal Statistical Society of England; while the table for Germany was prepared by Professor Conrad, statistician for the Jahrbücher für National Oekonomie und Statistik.

A glance at the table Exhibit B shows most clearly that, with slight exceptions, all through that period of twenty-three years, when prices rose in one country they rose in all three countries, and when they fell in one country they fell in all three countries. Yet during that period, as I have pointed out, we had here all sorts of tariffs. Most significant is the comment of the commissioners, found on page 39 following the table. They say:

Such slight divergencies as appear in the table are explained by the fact that the lists of staples are not identical, since the list includes 66 commodities for the United States, 42 for Great Britain, and 30 for Germany. Even with these divergencies it is evident that with countries on the same monetary basis the causes affecting the general level of prices are international, etc.

The chart prepared by the Industrial Commission ends with 1901. In the chart which I submit I have shown in addition the fluctuations in wholesale prices, so far as the United States and Great Britain are concerned, from 1901 to the beginning of 1909. The British figures for this latter period are derived from Sauerbeck's tables. The American figures are derived from the tables of the Bureau of Labor, based on the yearly average of about 250 articles (Exhibit C). It will be observed that the rise and fall of prices in free-trade Great Britain have continued to run parallel to the rise and fall of prices in our own country.

The chart in Exhibit C is an exact copy of the chart of the Industrial Commission from 1898 to 1901, except that Germany is left out. The figures and tables from 1878 to 1901 were all prepared by the economists whom I have named. They prepared tables of what are known as "index numbers." Those of you who were active in the campaign of 1896 understand what index numbers are; but, still, perhaps I had better explain briefly. For instance, in preparing his table of index numbers Professor Commons first ascertained the American average of wholesale prices for the period from 1879 to 1889. The index number for that period he then called 100 or par. Now, if, as in 1882, for instance, American wholesale prices rose to a point 20 per cent higher than the average of the whole decade, then the index number for 1882 would be 120. If wholesale prices fell, as they did in 1896, to a point 27 per cent below the average wholesale prices for the period from 1879 to 1889, then the index number for 1896 would be 73. This figure, as you see, is just 27 numbers below 100.

The Industrial Commission did not prepare those index numbers. I told you the names of the economists who did so. All that the Industrial Commission did was to prepare a chart which would show those index numbers in convenient form. This was accomplished by platting out each number for each year on a chart and connecting the numbers by lines, so as to show the course of prices. This chart (Exhibit C) from 1878 to 1901 was the work of the Industrial Commission. It shows that the fluctuation of wholesale prices from 1878 to 1901 was parallel in free-trade Great Britain to the fluctuation in protectionist America. From 1901 to the end of 1908 I prepared the rest of that chart myself. I prepared it from the index numbers in Sauerbeck's tables so far as Great Britain is concerned. Sauerbeck's tables are published in the Journal of the Royal Statistical Society every year in the month of March. They have been so published for some thirty years past. The figures are not out yet for 1909, but will be published in the month of March.

Sauerbeck's numbers are based on the wholesale prices for the decade from 1867 to 1877, a very much higher range of prices than the prices from 1879 to 1889. I have reduced them to the same basis or par as the index numbers of the Industrial Commission's chart, so as to show them to you all together. In the same way for the United States I have taken the index numbers from 1901 through 1908 prepared by the Bureau of Labor. The only difference is that Sauerbeck bases his figures on the average price of about 40 articles, while the Bureau of Labor takes the average of some 250 articles. The United States index numbers are based on the decade from 1889 to 1899, the lowest decade of prices that we have known. I have recalculated those numbers on the basis of the average prices from 1879 to 1889, in order to complete this chart on the basis of the diagram of the Industrial Commission.

CRUISE OF MASSACHUSETTS TRAINING SHIP "RANGER"—BOSTON PRICES COMPARED WITH THOSE OF NINE FOREIGN PORTS.

Mr. Chairman, I think we are all far too prone to mistrust statistics and charts unless they prove the truth of some pet prejudice. For that reason I always like to support statistics by corroborative evidence.

The Massachusetts training ship Ranger made a cruise in foreign waters in the summer of 1909.* She took on supplies at Boston, Mass.; Gravesend, England; Copenhagen, Denmark; Stockholm, Sweden; Amsterdam, Holland; Antwerp, Belgium; Gibraltar; Nice, France; Genoa, Italy; and at the Island of Bermuda. I append a table taken from her paymaster's books showing the exact prices paid for food supplies in all these ports. The list includes the prices of 16 staple articles of diet. (Exhibit E.)

It will be seen that the Boston prices were the lowest of all for beef, corned beef, veal, pork, bacon, ham, fowl, Frankfurters, Hamburg steak, fish, and ice, 11 of the 16 articles. For four of the remaining articles the Boston prices were far down on the list, while for potatoes the Boston price was the highest.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it a fact that they buy when they are at home, at the port of Boston, by annual contract, and buy in foreign ports at chance?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I can not tell the gentleman, but I recognize the importance of his question. I shall inquire.

Mr. FORNES. I am very much interested in the statistics that the gentleman has just given. I believe it is understood that there are two ingredients in sustaining life; that is, food and clothing. The first is to sustain and the second to preserve. The gentleman has spoken up to now as to the food, but the gentleman has failed to satisfy the Democrats, not only of this House but of the country, why under the present tariff clothing, which is the second essential in livelihood, is so high. I would like to have the gentleman give me an explanation as to that.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Is that a question?

Mr. FORNES. It is a question.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I have not as yet made a study of the clothing schedule, so I can not tell the gentleman. I am not lecturing on that subject. I am lecturing on the high cost of living.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman about the first chart that he spoke with relation to. I will ask the gentleman if he will print in his remarks a list of the forty-odd British products, and the 200 or more American products on which the tables of average wholesale prices are based.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I am not sure that I can do so, because I have no list of the 42 British items. I have no doubt you could get them from some report of the Royal Statistical Society, in London, or through the British Embassy. So far as the United States is concerned, I have no doubt that a request made of the Bureau of Labor would bring us the facts.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest that, if the gentleman will permit me, because I would like to have it printed in his remarks.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I should like to have it myself.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to inquire whether the 42 items included in making up the items of Great Britain are included in the items that would make up the chart for the United States?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes; I think they are included.

Mr. NORRIS. I think, perhaps, if the gentleman could get these items printed in his own remarks it would do very much to illumine the subject.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman very much for what he has said. I think so, too. (See Exhibit H for lists in answer to question.)

Mr. MURDOCK. Does this first chart, showing the colors, relate to the wholesale prices of the items coming under the head of products?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No; I could not separate them. This relates to all sorts of items—every kind of thing—clothing, iron, coal, everything.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the second chart relates wholly to food products?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes, absolutely to food products. I want to say in passing that the price of mutton in Gravesend, England, was only 6 cents a pound; but that was for Australian mutton, a very low grade of mutton.

* Incorrectly stated on diagram shown in Committee of the Whole House as 1908.

I hold in my hand a copy of the London Express of November, 1909.

Mr. BURLESON. Before the gentleman proceeds to read that, I should like to propound a query.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Fire away.

Mr. BURLESON. I hold in my hand a clipping from a recent issue of Harper's Weekly, which prints a statement from the New York Herald giving the prices of 20 different articles or food products in Windsor, Ontario, Canada, and in Detroit, Mich., just across the river, less than a mile apart. It shows that prices are 25 per cent higher in Detroit than in Windsor, on an average, and that in 19 cases the prices of these food products are higher, and only in 1 case are they lower in Detroit than in Windsor.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. And as against that——

Mr. BURLESON. Wait a moment. Is the gentleman willing——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I am not willing to yield for a speech, but I am willing to have the gentleman develop his question.

Mr. BURLESON. Is the gentleman willing to have that article read? It is only half as long as my finger. Is he willing to have it read, in order that understanding it he may explain it? You have said that you are willing to meet this issue candidly and courageously.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman can put the clipping in the RECORD when he speaks. I am going to put in the RECORD actual figures from Montreal, extracts from household bills, and figures in comparison from the Washington Center Market. I am also going to put in Dill's report of the comparative prices at Toronto and Buffalo. They show precisely the opposite of that which the gentleman quotes from the New York Herald.

Mr. BURLESON. Then the gentleman——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I am not going to print the gentleman's speech in the middle of my own.

Mr. BURLESON. Then the gentleman is familiar with the contents of this clipping?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Oh, perfectly.

Mr. BURLESON. And the gentleman says the statements therein are not true?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Oh, I do not know whether they are true or not. The Detroit Free Press denies them. Windsor, Ontario, is a suburb of Detroit. Right here in the District of Columbia you will find prices much higher on Connecticut avenue than in the suburban market at Georgetown. I am going to submit statements whose truth I guarantee. The gentleman will guarantee his statements if he is able to do so. Now, I wish to call attention to the London Express for November, 1909, with regard to the price of mutton.

English mutton rose from 69 shillings a hundredweight in 1904 to 71 shillings in 1907, and fell last year (1908) to 69 shillings again.

Sixty-nine shillings a hundredweight, gentlemen, is $17.25 wholesale for British mutton in England. What a row there would be if American mutton brought that price at wholesale!

And yet just such newspaper articles as that which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] has brought to our attention are comparing the price of mutton in this country with mutton in England. They neglect to tell us that the English price which they quote is for Australian frozen mutton and not for the British article.

I know of course that I can not possibly satisfy those who do not wish to be satisfied. I am very much afraid that gentlemen on the other side of the House will not be interested in a magazine article from which I shall read to you. It is written by an American traveler, a keen observer, who last summer investigated the cost of living and the rates of wages abroad. I shall read you a few passages from this article, which I print in full in Exhibit A. I shall not tell you the author's name just now.

WAGES AND COST OF LIVING.

"Where are wages best?" workingmen ask me. "Other points in favor of America don't count for much if a man's earnings here can't bring him a better living than in European countries. Is it true that a mark in Germany or a franc in France will go as far as a dollar in the United States?"

Listen to these figures on English wages:

IN GREAT BRITAIN.

In the debates and conferences at the British Trade Union Congress at Ipswich, in September, the national trade-union secretaries and other prominent delegates could hardly be expected to err greatly when referring to earnings in their own occupations. Some of their statements are herein given. Richard Bell, M. P., of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, speaking of the necessity for railway men in the district to come into the unions, said that while working at 17 shillings ($4.25) a week, they had refused to assist the union in getting them an advance of 2 shillings. It is to be kept in mind that the English shilling is really 24 American cents, though usually computed at 25 cents. G. H. Roberts, M. P., averred that in some parts of East Anglia, the eastern central part of England, agricultural laborers are being paid 12 shillings a week. Will Thorne, M. P., mentioned that builders' laborers in Ipswich were receiving 4½ pence (9 cents) an hour. Men in the audience called out: "Quite right, and 3½ pence, sir."

After more figures of the same sort appears the following sentence:

In the foregoing figures we have for England examples not only of the highest wages paid in some of the best organized trades, but also of the rates current in the most poorly organized. In other words, the range covers the varying scales for all wage-workers' occupations. Further quotations would carry but a repetition of what is a general fact.

So much for England. Let me read you about Germany. Remember that a German mark, an English shilling, and an American quarter are all the same in value.

GERMANY.

A general survey of wages in Germany is to be had in the tables giving the average yearly earnings, as reported under the workingmen's insurance laws. The Correspondenzblatt of the Trade Union General Commission for Germany, April 18, 1908, page 55, has one of these tables. Only three or four of the trades average over 1,200 marks ($300), at which sum, according to the law, begins the excess reckoned at one-third the actual amount. Most of the averages run less than 1,000 marks ($250). These general insurance statistics of wages may be verified by union scales. For instance, the Berlin saddlers' organization calls for 27 or 28 marks a week; the Hamburg shipbuilders, 34 to 50 marks; the Berlin plumbers, 60 to 70 pfennigs an hour for a nine-hour day, being eight to nine dollars a week. These are among the highest wages. The lowest are for day laborers, which rarely go above 3 marks a day and sometimes below 2½, in a list compiled by the local authorities in three cities, in accordance with the insurance laws.

GERMANY AND ENGLAND PAY THE BEST WAGES IN EUROPE.

Is there anyone here interested in the name of the author of this article? He is said to be a Democrat. I suppose you gentlemen on the other side of the House think that he is some minion of the tariff robbers.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does he give the wages of the farm laborers in Germany?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I am not sure, but I shall print the whole article in connection with this speech as Exhibit A. My observation is that farm labor in Germany is, to a large extent, performed by women.

Now we come to one of the most significant passages in the report:

VARIATION IN STANDARDS OF LIVING.

Mentally contemplating the many cities I visited, and having in mind the conversations I had with workingmen who had lived both in Europe and America, I believe I may assert that whether the cost of living in Europe or America is greater to the workingman depends entirely on the standard of living he adopts while in America. If he voluntarily lives the life of self-denial in this country that he compulsorily lived in his native land, his outlay in money will remain about the same. Even then he will hardly be able to escape gaining something from the superior supply of the good things of life in America.

A LIST OF NECESSARIES CHEAP IN AMERICA.

Living is cheap to the wage-worker in Europe only because he does without what in America soon becomes a necessity to him—food in good quantity and quality, presentable clothes among his aspiring fellow-workmen and their families, and a comfortably furnished home in quarters responding to his awakened desire for equality with his American neighbors, and in general a larger and freer life.

* * * * * * *

How often do these people eat meat? is a question the American in Europe finds himself asking when looking about among wage-workers. Meat is usually from 25 to 100 per cent higher in price than in the United States.

* * * * * * *

The immigrant coming to America finds that if he can buy in quantity, and (in cases where he need not) his flour, fuel, potatoes, oil, sugar, coffee, salt—the essentials for his plain table—all cost less than they ordinarily do in the land he left. The cheapness and abundance of many varieties of fruits and of our melons and tomatoes is a surprise to him. Closely after the most pressing necessities comes a line of things cheaper than in Europe—cotton clothing, including overalls, jumpers, shoes.

* * * * * * *

Fine wool and silk stuffs, furs, laces, and kid gloves cost less abroad than in the United States—a fact, however, which bears as lightly in an inquiry into the conditions of the masses as does a tariff on the masterpieces of art.

Well, gentlemen of the Democratic party, I suppose you think that this article was written to bolster up the tariff. The moment has come for me to inform you that I have been reading out of the American Federationist for January, 1910, from a report made by the president of the American Federation of Labor, Samuel Gompers. [Applause on the Republican side.] I never expected to see the day when there would not be even a hand of applause at Mr. Gompers's name from the Democratic side. Now, I shall read you a little more.

Finally, Mr. Gompers concludes in this way:

CONCLUSION.

The main conclusion as to housing is the same as that relating to food: If the immigrant to this country is willing to continue living here at the same level he was obliged to accept in his native land, he can find it for the same money.

That report of President Gompers——

Mr. BOEHNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BOEHNE. Is it not somewhat strange that Samuel Gompers is quoted here? Is it not a fact that his statements are discounted a very great deal on the Republican side of this House, and have been in the past?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No, sir. When Samuel Gompers is right the Republican party is with him every time, and when he is wrong, or when anyone else is wrong, the Republican party is not with him.

Mr. BOEHNE. Has the Republican party at any time thought that Samuel Gompers was right?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Not when he supported Bryan.

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Chairman, I think that is an evasion of the question.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Oh, I think I have treated the gentleman fairly.

Mr. BOEHNE. I would not expect the gentleman to be candid in his answer to that question.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That report of Mr. Gompers is the best evidence the world has yet received that the higher wages of American workmen are clear gain. That report explains, as nothing else has explained, why a million souls come as immigrants annually to this country, and that report cuts the ground out from underneath all you free traders.

A MEMBER on Democratic side. We are not free traders.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman says that you are not free traders. Perhaps I was thinking of the declarations of the Democratic party platform in 1908 rather than of the votes of Democratic members on the tariff bill in 1909.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. In a few minutes, not now. I want to read some very interesting literature first. Perhaps you may not all be free traders, but you have elected as your leader a man who is proud to call himself a free trader. If by any mischance you control the next House you will elect that same free trader to the Speakership. I am aware that the passages from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which I shall read are not new to all of you. Here are some words spoken by your leader, the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CHAMP CLARK, on the floor of this House. He said:

I repeat, so that all men may hear, that I am a free trader.

* * * * * * *

If I had my way to-day, sir, I would tear them [the custom-houses] all down from turret to foundation stone, for from the beginning they have been nothing but dens of robbers.

Oh, tear them all down, gentlemen, when you get the power, but beware of the American workman when he finds himself forced to compete with the foreigner who earns less than $1 a day.

MONTREAL AND WASHINGTON FOOD PRICES COMPARED.

A little further evidence as to the cost of living elsewhere may not be amiss. On February 2, 1910, I secured from Mr. W. H. Bradley, our consul-general at Montreal, a list, taken from his provision bills for the last few months, of the prices he paid for the ordinary daily supplies for his own household.

On receipt from Canada of this interesting statement, I secured, on February 6, from the superintendent of the Center Market, in Washington, a list of the current prices here for ordinary family provisions. While in many respects the nomenclature of the two lists does not correspond, and while the measures by which vegetables are sold are widely different, I think that the two lists are well worthy of inspection, and therefore I shall print them in full as an appendix to this address (Exhibit G).

Many items in both lists, however, correspond in names and in measures. I shall now give you the different prices in each city in all cases where they can be accurately compared:

I print as Exhibit F the report of Mr. H. P. Dill on the corresponding prices of food products at retail in Toronto and Buffalo. This report shows that the prices in Toronto are higher than those in Buffalo.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he leaves the question of prices and on this question free trade. I judge from the gentleman's diagram of the cost of food that he is a free trader so far as food products are concerned. I think he has admitted we export those products largely and we get them cheaper than they do anywhere in the world anyway, whereas it is not the producer being injured but the consumer.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Of course you know that I am no free trader. You are asking why the farmer needs protection if what I have said is correct. Is that the question?

Mr. GILLESPIE. On food products, I said. What good does the tariff do the farmer so far as food products are concerned?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. A very proper question and one which I am glad to answer.

Canada lies to the north of us. Its fields are fertile, its people are intelligent. The inhabitants of Manitoba and Alberta and Saskatchewan can scarcely be distinguished from the inhabitants of the Dakotas and of Montana. Our neighbors to the north are far advanced in the science of husbandry, and, on even terms, they compete with us in the world's markets. Break down our protective barrier and Canadian food products will pour into our market to compete at equal prices with our own products. The prices will be no lower, but Canada will save all her large export charges and transfer them to the shoulders of our own people. For every bushel of wheat which Canada sends us a bushel of American wheat must give way and seek a foreign market. For every pound of meat she sends us we must make room at the expense of a pound of American meat. "True enough," perhaps you think. "But shall we not in return, under a reciprocity agreement, displace an equal amount of Canadian goods in their own home market?" By no means. We should find that we had exchanged a market of 80,000,000 souls for a market of less than 7,000,000 souls—a poor bargain, I submit.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Then it is not true that the foreign market so far as food products is concerned is higher than our market. Then why should Canadian food products come here if the foreign market is higher than ours?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Why, because of the higher cost of transportation to foreign markets and because of the large middleman's profits connected with exports to Europe. In many foreign markets duties must also be paid.

THE PAYNE LAW.

If it be true that the tariff, otherwise than as a promoter of general prosperity, is responsible for the rise in prices of the last decade, how is it that sugar, one of the most highly protected articles of diet, has remained practically at the same price at which it stood in 1896? How is it that the sensational rise in raw cotton has been maintained through good crops and bad crops when it has been on the free list all the time?

If the imposition of a tariff raises the prices of food products, a reduction of the tariff surely must lower them. In vain we looked for that result last summer.

The Payne Act lowered the duty on articles whose yearly consumption in this country amounts in value to $5,000,000,000. It raised the duty on articles whose yearly consumption amounts to $850,000,000, and two-thirds in value of the latter class of articles were luxuries at that; $5,000,000,000 on the credit side as against only $850,000,000 on the debit side. (Exhibit D.)

Yet, whether the Payne Act raised the duty on any given article or whether it lowered the duty on that article or whether it left the duty untouched, since the passage of the act, so far as I know, almost every article has risen in price. Meanwhile the smiling retailer with Democratic leanings beguiles his customer with apologies for raising his prices on account of the wicked Payne Act.

In the food schedule of the new tariff law the duty was slightly raised on sweet biscuit, hops, figs, almonds, lemons, pineapples, and chicory root. I believe that this exhausts the list of increases in the tariff on food products. The duties were substantially cut on cabbages, tallow, peas, sugar beets, salt, lard, bacon, hams, and dressed meats. Since the law was passed most of these commodities have risen in price. Yet who could guess which of those articles have been given greater protection and which of them have been given less if his sole source of information were a comparison of the increase in their prices?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield the gentleman ten minutes additional.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That will be sufficient.

REPUBLICAN DOCTRINE OF FIFTY YEARS' STANDING.

If we in New England desire protection for our manufactures against the products of the ill-paid workmen of Europe, how can we deny a like measure of protection to the food producers of the nation? Protection as a great national policy must be applied to all or to none. Without protection the textile industries of New England could not live, and the day is already at hand when our shoe shops will feel the result of the improvements of shoemaking methods in Europe.

The temptation is strong for us New England Congressmen to shout for free trade in food. That cry this year would save us many a vote in our districts. Shortsighted is mankind. Many a man in Massachusetts demands free trade in food with the very same lips that are daily fed by protection to the industry wherein he is engaged. Once deprive the farmer of the protection which is his due, and the time is short before he will join with our enemies and overthrow our system.

The United States has led the whole world in the destruction of the doctrines of the Manchester school of free traders. England alone holds out; but even in England the handwriting is on the wall and the days of free trade are numbered.

I say to you, my fellow-members of the Republican party, do not recant your faith. Do not for the sake of the coming election yield one jot or one tittle of your principles. Every one of you knows that the repeal of the farmer's protection means the destruction of our tariff edifice.

Do not quail before the gathering clouds. Fight it out on the lines that we have held for fifty years, and if in the people's wisdom we are driven from power for a time rest assured that we shall again be restored, stronger, purer, and manlier, in that no blot of cowardice has stained our record.

WAGES AND COST OF LIVING.

[Report of President Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor. American Federationist, January, 1910.]

"Where are wages best?" workingmen ask me. "Other points in favor of America don't count for much if a man's earnings here can't bring him a better living than in European countries. Is it true that a mark in Germany or a franc in France will go as far as a dollar in the United States?"

In reply, some examples of wages in Europe may be given and then some description of the circumstances in the European workmen's situation as I took note of them. Precisely what the differences are in the cost of living in the different countries is a question involving many factors over which sociological investigators and tariff wranglers have long disputed. What I can give is the result of visiting workmen in their homes in various cities, hearing the statements of labor representatives and others as to prices and wages, and completing this sort of information with comparisons of wage scales and trade-union reports given me in the countries I visited.

IN GREAT BRITAIN.

In the debates and conferences at the British Trade Union Congress, at Ipswich, in September, the national trade-union secretaries and other prominent delegates could hardly be expected to err greatly when referring to earnings in their own occupations. Some of their statements are herewith given. Richard Bell, M. P., of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, speaking of the necessity for railway men in the Ipswich district to come into the unions, said that while working at 17 shillings ($4.25) a week they had refused to assist the union in getting them an advance of 2 shillings. It is to be kept in mind that the English shilling is really 24 American cents, though usually computed at 25. G. H. Roberts, M. P., averred that in some parts of East Anglia, the eastern central part of England, agricultural laborers are being paid 12 shillings a week. Will Thorne, M. P., mentioned that builders' laborers in Ipswich were receiving 4½ pence (9 cents) an hour. Men in the audience called out: "Quite right, and 3½ pence, sir." A. G. Smith, of the London cab drivers, said public motor-car men received 25 per cent on every pound they took in, but as they had to pay for their gasoline, which was often wasted, it frequently happened that all they had for themselves after a fifteen-hour day was 2 shillings. R. Davies, of the municipal employees, arguing for a recognized minimum in all industries, quoted the Ipswich trade-union minimum for builders' laborers as 5 pence per hour. A resolution was adopted advocating minimum wages of 30 shillings for a 48-hour week for government workers in the London district and 36 shillings in the danger buildings of the explosives factory in the arsenal at Woolwich. These two demands, it is to be observed, which mark an objective point above what is paid, reach only $7.50 and $9 a week.

In London the present weekly union scale for men in the binding department in printing offices is 34 shillings for fifty-four hours, and for cutters 30 shillings, and girl folders 15. In the private shipyards doing naval work—those in the Tyne, Clyde, Mersey, Thames, and Barrow districts—the wages run on the average: Platers, 38s. 3d.; riveters and calkers, 24s. 9d.; holders up, 28s. 3d. Government dockyards maximum pay is: Platers, 28 shillings; riveters and calkers, 28 shillings; holders up, 25 shillings. The entire range here is $6 to less than $9.50.

The long hours worked in some occupations was called to the attention of the Congress. It was said by Alderman J. Hayhurst, J. P., of the bleachers' union, to be a common thing for men in the bleaching, dyeing, and calico-printing industries to work twelve and fourteen hours a day. Councilor G. T. Jackson, J. P., of the tramway employees' union, introduced a resolution calling for an eight-hour lapse between the end of one day's work and the beginning of the next, and providing that any one day should not be spread over more than twelve hours. He told of an accident occurring at 11 p. m. through the exhaustion of a man who had begun work at 6 a. m. E. Spice, of the London watermen, wanted twelve hours as a maximum day for the lads under 18 working at lighterage on the Thames. A delegate of the tailors stated that women employed by a fashionable Regent street firm worked eighty-four hours a week for 3 pence an hour.

In the foregoing figures we have for England examples not only of the highest wages paid in some of the best organized trades, but also of the rates current in those poorly organized. In other words, the range covers the varying scales for all wage-workers' occupations. Further quotations would carry but the repetition of what is a general fact. Earnings in England, however, can not be based on weekly wage scales; unemployment, varying as to the individuals involved, is now so bad as to be spoken of as a settled national feature in industry. The inspector-general of the army was quoted at Ipswich as mentioning in his last annual report that 90 out of every 100 men enlisting in the army had given unemployment as their reason for becoming soldiers.

IN GERMANY.

A general survey of wages in Germany is to be had in the tables giving the average yearly earnings as reported under the workingmen's insurance laws. The Correspondenzblatt of the Trade Union General Commission for Germany, April 18, 1908, page 55, has one of these tables. Only three or four of the trades average over 1,200 marks ($300), at which sum, according to the law, begins the excess reckoned at one-third the actual amount. Most of the averages run less than 1,000 marks ($250). These general insurance statistics of wages may be verified by union scales. For instance, the Berlin saddlers' organization calls for 27 or 28 marks a week; the Hamburg shipbuilders, 34 to 50 marks; the Berlin plumbers, 60 to 70 pfennigs an hour for a nine-hour day, being $8 to $9 a week. These are among the highest wages. The lowest are for day laborers, which rarely go above 3 marks a day and sometimes below 2½ in a list compiled by the local authorities in three cities in accordance with the insurance laws.

IN AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

In Austria and Hungary wages run, as seen by the American eye, accustomed to dollars, at about equal levels for the two countries, high in big cities and low in agricultural districts. The industry of Hungary in flour milling. Budapest millers boasted to me that their mills were better than those of Minneapolis. A few years ago, before the workmen were organized, mill wages varied, one giving but 50 cents a day for work that in other mills brought 80. The pay for skilled millers, while more nearly uniform, averages now less than the latter figure. In Budapest, bricklayers, among the best-paid workmen in the building trades, get $1 to $1.20 a day. In the winter they find unskilled work at 60 cents. First-class carpenter joiners earn $1.30 to $1.90. Budapest has a thousand female cigar makers, working in the government factories, at 30 to 40 cents a day. Miners in north Hungary sometimes attain to the level of 60 cents.

IN ITALY.

The wages in Italy reach their highest point in Milan, the great modern commercial and industrial city of the Kingdom. In 1907 the following were some of the demands of the unions: The painters and paper hangers, a minimum of 60 cents, 80 cents, and $1 a day (American money), eight and a half hours in the winter and ten the rest of the year; stationary firemen, 9 cents an hour; gold-leaf workers, $1.20; assistants, 75 cents, nine hours; bookbinders, 10 per cent advance for the men making 80 cents a day, 15 per cent for hands making 50 cents to 80, 22 per cent for those making 30 to 50; masons and assistants in the building trades, minimum per hour, 9 cents; apprentices, 7½; laborers, 6; boys, 4; lithographers, graded, $8.40, $7.80, $7; street cleaners, graded, 78, 72, 67, 60, and 45 cents a day.

The trade unions are much stronger in Milan than elsewhere in Italy. Wages taper off southward, the unions also diminishing in number and importance. The building trades in the south have wages only 60 to 70 per cent of those paid in Milan, as recorded at the union national headquarters.

CHEAP POLICEMEN.

Quotations from my notes on union wage scales for the smaller countries, such as Belgium, Switzerland, and Bohemia (the latter having its own national labor movement), would give slight variations of wages, somewhat between the Italian and English or German levels. As I have said, the American mind, accustomed to make estimates in dollars, can not easily appreciate differences that to the European workman may appear considerable. To be told that the policemen in London get $6 to $9 a week; in Paris, $6 to $8; in Vienna or Rome, $5 to $7, leaves the man who has acquaintances on the New York force at $20 and $30 only under the impression that all European policemen are cheap, an impression deepened after he has tipped a London policeman 6 pence for hunting a cab for him ten minutes, or a Vienna policeman 5 cents for giving information as to his baggage at a railway station.

AMERICAN WORKING PEOPLE TRAVELING IN EUROPE.

In Europe it is a matter of great astonishment that our women school-teachers can afford to make "the grand tour" on their own savings. Scores, perhaps hundreds, to-day of our bright instructresses make the two ocean voyages for $100 and travel to London, Paris, the Rhine, perhaps Berlin and Rome, for six or seven or even ten weeks, for $250 more. The young European mechanic or laborer, home again after two or three years in America, smartly clothed and flush in spending money, perhaps back to be married, is a common subject for neighborhood gossip in Europe, whether it relates to the printer in Liverpool, the miner in Westphalia, the cigar maker in Prague, or the "excavator" in Naples. Such facts, elusive to the census maker, tell a story of their own.

PRINTERS' WAGES COMPARED.

The printing trade, in all countries at the highest point in union organization, affords a basis for wage comparisons. In New York the union weekly scale for compositors on morning newspapers is $31; on book work, $21.50. In London the book scale is 39 shillings (less than $9.50); in Paris, the minimum, $9; in Milan, $7 (5.20 lire per day); in Austria the towns and cities are divided into six classes for compositors' weekly wages, running, respectively, $4.40, $4.80, $5.20, $5.60, $5.80, and $6.20; in Budapest the minimum scale is $4.80. The custom of paying the best hands more than the minimum scale is more prevalent in European countries than in America. The briefest mention of the printing business, with comparison of wages, requires notice of the fact that machinery, and that of the first order, in the press and composing rooms is in more common use in America than in any European country. I was shown through a model book and job printing office in London that had no composing machines, and the Cologne Zeitung, the great daily newspaper of Rhenish Germany, has none. Seldom are any seen in the many cooperative establishments. They are rare in the offices of Austria, Hungary, and Italy. I am reliably informed that more type is set in one daily newspaper office in a week in New York than in all the printing offices of Naples. That fact is in agreement with the rule that with high wages in America there is often a low cost of production, coming from the education and energy of the workers, perfected machinery, and organization on a large scale. My facts indicate that money wages in America in many trades are double those paid abroad.

But, the cost of living?

VARIATION IN STANDARDS OF LIVING.

Two classes of writers and talkers may be found who assert that "one may live in Europe on half what it costs in America." The first of these classes is the employers of Europe as a body; they are interested in keeping their workmen with them, to compete with one another, besides being actuated by anti-American sentiment that calls for no more than mention here. The other class is mostly made up of well-to-do American sojourners abroad. The latter undoubtedly find several items in their own outlay less than in America, among them being personal service, objects of luxury, and their house rents. As relating to themselves and their social classes, their assertions are correct, especially as regards city life. The European working classes, however, neither hire servants nor buy articles of luxury except in rare cases. The struggle for a barely decent living is ever before them. Their necessary annual family "budget" comprises plain and cheap food, which, on the average, takes 40 to 65 per cent of the entire outlay, quarters in either an "industrial" or "slum" district, requiring 20 to 35 per cent, and clothing 10 per cent or more. These percentages must be indefinite, depending as they do upon the size of the family, on earnings, and on climate, and even the government. Mentally contemplating the many cities I visited, and having in mind the conversations I had with workingmen who had lived both in Europe and America, I believe I may assert that whether the cost of living in Europe or America is greater to the workingman depends entirely on the standard of living he adopts while in America. If he voluntarily lives the life of self-denial in this country that he compulsorily lived in his native land, his outlay in money will remain about the same. Even then he will hardly be able to escape gaining something from the superior supply of the good things of life in America.

If I am called on to name one of the good things which is conspicuous, I reply: "Our common schools for the workers' children," and as I write the words I hear again the enthusiastic sentiments on this point uttered in my presence by Italians, Bohemians, Austrians, and Irishmen. "To think," they say, "your country gives even the schoolbooks free!"

A LIST OF NECESSARIES CHEAP IN AMERICA.

Living is cheap to the wage-worker in Europe only because he does without what in America soon becomes a necessity to him—food in good quantity and quality, presentable clothes among his aspiring fellow-workmen and their families, and a comfortably furnished home in quarters responding to his awakened desires for equality with his American neighbors, and in general a large and freer life.

"How often do these people eat meat?" is a question the American in Europe finds himself asking when looking about among wage-workers. Meat is usually from 25 to 100 per cent higher in price than in the United States. Naples and vicinity is often spoken of as offering plentiful and cheap living. Within the customs-bonded district of the port of Naples are large cold-storage warehouses, whence meat is furnished to vessels in the American and Mediterranean service. It is American meat. If it could be carted just 100 yards from the warehouse through the gates of the great iron customs-department fence into Naples, this meat could be sold at from 25 to 50 per cent below local prices. The warehouse owners stand ready to do business with all Italy, furnishing a better grade of meat at greatly reduced prices, if the tariff barrier were removed. This is but a single illustration of a general fact. Staple American agricultural products—wheat, fruits, cheese—in many parts of Europe are sold at lower than the local prices or as low. The immigrant, coming to America, finds that if he can buy in quantity (and in cases where he need not) his flour, fuel, potatoes, oil, sugar, coffee, salt—the essentials for his plain table—all cost less than they ordinarily do in the land he left. The cheapness and abundance of many varieties of fruits and of our melons and tomatoes is a surprise to him. Closely after the most pressing necessities comes a line of things cheaper than in Europe—cotton clothing, including overalls, jumpers, shoes (the American shoe has a sale all over the Continent); newspapers, the cent buying twice to four times the reading matter contained in a German, French, or Italian paper. Access to good water renders expenditure for alcoholic drinks less common. The cheapness of good amusements in America deserves more attention than has been given the subject by the professional investigator; it is a social factor having an enormous influence on the tastes and education of the working-class public. The possibility of regarding outlay for amusements as one of the regular items in family expenses is an indication of the working class standard of living.

POVERTY IN GREAT BRITAIN.

How the wage-earners and their families attire themselves is not so much a question of the cheapness of clothing as it is of what is left over for this purpose after food, shelter, and other unavoidable family needs have been provided for. The features of climate, national customs, and class standards must also be considered. In southern countries, where the same clothes are worn the year around, people may appear well in public at half the expense required in America, in the North, where there are four seasons. In the United Kingdom the poor dress in much the same clothing summer and winter, the large proportion of the people in shabby clothes in the streets of Dublin, Manchester, or London giving an impression to the American observer of a prevalent poverty.

The masses make a better appearance in Paris and Berlin. In Italy a young fellow may be a dandy in a straw hat and cotton duck suit. Fine wool and silk stuffs, furs, laces, and kid gloves cost less abroad than in the United States—a fact, however, which bears as lightly in an inquiry into the conditions of the masses as does the tariff on the masterpieces of art.

HOUSING.

The housing of the wage-workers of the various European countries as compared with that of the same class in America would, in order to bring out the full truth, require a long and faithful study. When the facts were ascertained, the real point remaining would be how to present them in order to create an exact impression of the truth. Besides, in making comparisons, a difficulty would be in fixing an American standard. Conditions exist in a few American cities, such as New York, Pittsburg, and Chicago, representing neither European nor American standards, but what are created through the transition of the most helpless of our newly arrived immigrants from a state perhaps more miserable than that in which they lived in their native countries to a level equal to the financially lowest that is permanent among the American-born citizens. Looking at the housing problem widely, the greatest fact in favor of America is space. The workingman in the country towns and in the cities smaller than those in which the foreign population is congested can rent or perhaps buy a separate home. In general, Europe does not give this opportunity. For example, Bremen is the only considerable city in Germany which has small single-family houses adapted to the needs of working people. Only the big tenement house, except in rare cases, is to be found in other cities. The wage-earner in them is regarded as permanently a rent payer, an animal in a stall in a five, six, or seven story stable. No, not one animal in one stall; not so good as that—whole families or a herd of lodgers live in one of the stalls. The doubling up of families of relatives, the keeping of lodgers, the hiring of a small apartment by several young persons, such devices for distribution among many persons the burdens of rent must be general in cities where apartments are made the landlord's investment and few small homes are built to sell the man with a small purse. The barracks-like houses of the German cities are planned so as to accommodate people in comparatively easy circumstances in the desirable apartments of the front, up to the fourth story, while the basement and the small rear and the topmost apartments go to the swarm of folks living on low wages. Berlin has been called "the city that wears a dickey," since its imposing streets of big dwelling houses have the best apartments on view to the front, behind which exist shabbiness and the general unattractiveness of things unseen. In the northern district of Berlin is the new "workingmen's quarter," with broad streets, window-garden houses, and evidences of municipal care as to hygiene, one result being that rents, compared with wages, run close to the high American level.

RENTS.

In no city in Europe did I find rents any cheaper, wages considered, than they run in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Louisville, or in the New England towns not having a boom, or even in many cities of the Mississippi basin. What strikes the American is how little the European renting wage-worker gets for his money. Very seldom indeed has he a bit of garden; he takes a poor water service for granted; his rooms are fewer and smaller than is ordinarily the case in an American house. The rent payer is usually a rent payer for life. No institution of the proportion of the American building and loan association exists in any European country. The movement of large masses from the position of rent payers to that of householders has been characteristic of America. European philanthropists, statesmen, and cooperators are at the present time endeavoring to establish the necessary methods to bring about the same results.

CONCLUSIONS.

Space here, to my regret, is insufficient to permit me to quote the rentals paid by wage-workers in various European cities which are entered in my notes. I have been obliged to give my conclusions on the subject in general terms. The main conclusion as to housing is the same as that relating to food: If the immigrant to this country is willing to continue living here at the same level he was obliged to accept in his native land, he can find it for the same money.

The index numbers for Great Britain, as originally compiled, are based on the prices for the years 1867–1877, but have been converted to the base of 1879–1889 for comparison. The index numbers for the United States are for the crop or fiscal year July 1 to June 30, while those for Germany are calendar years, and those for Great Britain are calendar years 1879 to 1883, and thereafter crop years.

FLUCTUATION IN WHOLESALE PRICES IN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN FROM 1878 TO JANUARY 1, 1909.

Average prices for period from 1879 to 1889—100.

This chart, from 1879 to 1901, is taken from Volume XIX, page 38, Report of the Industrial Commission (based on Professor Commons's tables for the United States and Sauerbeck's tables for Great Britain). RETAIL PRICES COMPARED BETWEEN BUFFALO, N. Y., AND TORONTO, CANADA.

Report of United States Consul H. P. Dill as to prices in Toronto and Buffalo (United States Consular Reports, Sept. 13, 1909):

"A Toronto newspaper has investigated the prevailing retail prices in Buffalo and Toronto, and shows that prices generally are lower in the United States than in Canada. These two cities were selected because of their relative equality in population, location, transportation, and general development. The summing up seems to favor the American city in about every case:

"'Ready-made clothing is about the same in price in both cities, though boys' suits at $2.75, overcoats with fur collar at same price, an exceedingly good-looking suit for a man at $9.75, and goods which appeared of equal quality, have never been seen in Toronto. In the very cheap lines of things used by men the difference is distinctly in favor of Buffalo. Umbrellas at 42 cents would bring in Toronto 60 cents. Cotton shirts at 42 cents are 50 cents here. In footwear the Buffalo people have the advantage. Ladies' and men's boots displayed at several Buffalo stores at $2.50 are sold "every day" in Toronto for $3.50.

"'In crockery, Buffalo prices are much lower. Vegetable dishes, retailing at 20 cents in Toronto, are to be had for 10 cents in Buffalo. Three-piece toilet sets selling at 52 cents would be quick sellers in Toronto for $1. Very many smaller articles were selling at 5 cents each, but the prices could not be duplicated in Toronto. Granite ware and such has a shade margin in favor of Buffalo on most articles, but on some the difference is fully as great as on crockery. Crumb trays at 10 cents are 25 cents in Toronto.

"'A gas range selling in Canada for $25 can be bought for $21. A No. 9 cooking stove, with hot-water tank attachment, sells for $35; this is fully $7 lower than in Canada. In all goods in this line Buffalo has the advantage by just about the amount of the Canadian duty, or 25 per cent.

"'In tea and coffee, as far as can be judged, the Toronto price is a shade below. In this connection it might be well to say that it is very difficult to find as good coffee in Canada as in the United States. Canada has relatively more tea-drinking people than the United States, and grocers generally carry a larger variety of tea than do American dealers. There is no doubt that as good tea can be found in the United States as in Canada; but, on the other hand, a first-class coffee is a scarce article in Canada.'

"Taking into account all the lines covered, the cost of household necessities is considerably higher in Toronto than in Buffalo."

RETAIL PRICES COMPARED BETWEEN WASHINGTON, D. C., AND MONTREAL, CANADA.

AMERICAN CONSULAR SERVICE,
Montreal, Canada, February 2, 1910.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of January 28th, would say there are no catalogues published in Montreal covering the prices of food products in general. I am sending a list of prices of the ordinary daily supplies, taken from my own household bills of the last few months, to the Department of State for transmission to you.

I have not included groceries beyond the staples, as they vary much in quality and are largely imported from England and the United States. If it would help you to have them, I will make a list as complete as may be.

Please let me know if this is not just what you want, with such details as may guide me in procuring what would be most helpful to you.

Very truly, yours,

WILLIAM HARRISON BRADLEY,
Consul-General.

Supplies for the Massachusetts training ship Ranger were bought during 1909, as follows:

In Boston, Mass., by wholesale contracts (similar to hotel contracts) running for some six months.

In foreign ports, on competitive bids in each port to supply provisions for the ship's company (about 125 persons) to last for varying short periods.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few remarks upon the post-office bill, but after listening to the splendid presentation of it this morning by the able chairman of this committee, I feel that my remarks will be wasted. Before I enter upon a discussion of any of the things embraced in the bill I desire to testify on behalf of the worthy chairman of this great committee as well as the members of the subcommittee which prepared the bill for the House. I know the chairman and his subcommittee worked faithfully to present to this body and to the country a bill above criticism, working along two lines—one economy, and the other efficiency of service.

When the bill is understood, I believe it will be the unanimous judgment of all the Members of this House that it is as near a perfect bill as can be prepared by any committee, and in saying what I intend to say I shall offer no criticism whatever upon the committee or upon Congress, because I do not believe there can be found in the bill a single dollar but what is a necessary dollar going to the efficiency of the service, and which dollar is based upon law. But I do desire this evening in a few words to bring to this committee some criticism upon some of the existing law now governing the Post-Office Department. The Postmaster-General in his report says that at the close of the fiscal year 1909 there was a deficit of $17,479,770.40. Where does this deficit come from? I do not appropriate to myself the ability to correctly answer this question, because men of much more ability than I possess, of longer tenure in this House, for the past fourteen years have been wrestling with this problem, namely, What is the cause of the deficit and how are we going to wipe it out?

President Taft, in his message to Congress of last December, used this language:

> The deficit every year in the Post-Office Department is largely caused by the low rate of postage of 1 cent a pound charged on second-class mail matter, which includes not only newspapers but magazines and periodicals. The actual loss growing out of the transmission of this second-class mail matter at 1 cent a pound amounts to $63,000,000 a year. The average cost of transportation of this matter is more than 9 cents a pound.

The Postmaster-General, in his report, arrives at substantially the same conclusion, figuring that it costs 9.235 cents a pound for the Government to transport second-class mail matter and that the Government derives 1.143 cents a pound revenue, and that there is a loss of 8.092 cents per pound to the Government in the handling of second-class mail matter. Both the President and the Postmaster-General agree upon the one proposition, that the present postal deficit is due absolutely and alone to the low rate of postage upon second-class matter.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will you permit me a minute?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is not this distinction to be made between the President and the Postmaster-General in their reports, that the President said the cost was for the transportation of second-class matter, and the Postmaster-General said that a similar cost was for the transportation and handling of second-class matter? Is not that true?

Mr. COX of Indiana. That may be true. Possibly there is some small difference in their opinion upon that, but they both arrive at the same opinion—that the deficit is due to the low rate of postage upon second-class matter. They both have the same opinion as to the wiping out of that deficit—that is, to increase the rate of postage upon second-class matter.

President Taft, in his message, says that this is a subsidy pure and simple to the publishers. Mr. Chairman, I deny that this is a subsidy to the publishers. But if it be a subsidy at all, it is a subsidy inuring to the masses of the people by giving to them cheaper newspapers, magazines, and periodicals. But, strange to say, Mr. Chairman, the President is unwilling to stand for a subsidy inuring to the benefit of the masses of the people, but in the same message to Congress he is in favor of a ship subsidy. Upon this point, in the same message, he uses this language:

> The profits on foreign mails are perhaps a sufficient measure of the expenditures which might first be tentatively applied to this method of inducing American capital to undertake the establishment of American lines of steamships in those directions in which we now deem it most important that we should have means of transportation controlled in the interests of the expansion of our trade.

Our present postal deficit is now more than $17,000,000. The Postmaster-General, in his report which reached this body a short time ago, says that the Government of the United States made in the year 1909 $2,505,010.71 as a profit from our foreign mails.

The President is exceedingly anxious to wipe out the postal deficit by increasing the rate of postage upon second-class mail matter, and at the same time he is willing to withdraw from the Post-Office Department the sum of $2,500,000 which we are now annually making as a profit upon our foreign mail, and turn this over to a few shipowners, so as to stimulate foreign trade at the expense of the mass of the people.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does the gentleman regard the deficit of $17,000,000 a very serious thing for the postal service?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not.

Mr. GOULDEN. Or one that the business interests of the country would complain of?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does he not regard it as in the interest of the best postal system there is for the purpose of supplying the people?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to the answers to the above questions propounded by the gentleman from New York, I desire to say that while I want to see the Post-Office Department run in the interest of economy, and made self-sustaining, if the same can be done without crippling the service, I am in favor of good, efficient service in this department. It is the only department of the Government which attempts to be self-sustaining. No one of the other departments are self-sustaining.

What would be the situation if we followed to its last analysis the recommendation of the President? Perhaps we would wipe out the deficit, but in doing so we would withdraw two and a half million dollars which we are now making as profit on our foreign mail and give it to a few shipowners as a ship subsidy.

The committee, of which I have the pleasure of being an humble member, gave exhaustive hearings to the publishers of all second-class matter, and it was the unanimous opinion of all the publishers of second-class matter that if the rate of postage be increased above 1 cent a pound that the readers and subscribers of all second-class matter would have their subscription price raised to them.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of California. The committee did not at any time during that hearing go into the question of the profit now being paid by the publishers, did they? We did not inquire as to their capitalization nor the dividends they are paying to-day?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Oh, no; but there was a very full and exhaustive investigation as to the profits in advertising.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman allow me to make one statement?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of California. Since that inquiry I have been told by an entirely reputable gentleman that one gentleman who appeared before us, and he is a publisher of a very well-known magazine, draws a salary of $75,000 a year for conducting that magazine, and the salary is made in a large part, or one of the purposes is to keep the dividends of the concern from becoming outrageous, and the gentleman said to me, "Of course they will continue to pay this over."

Mr. COX of Indiana. That may be true, but it does not militate against the indisputable fact that if the rate on second-class matter be increased, the subscription price of all these peirodicals, newspapers, and magazines, will inevitably be increased to the subscriber. On this point I do not believe there was a single dissenting voice or opinion before our committee among all the publishers who appeared and testified before it. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I refuse to withdraw the profits we now make upon foreign mails and pay this money as a subsidy to the shipowners, and then make it up again by increasing the rate of postage upon all second-class mail, because this would increase the subscription price on all newspapers and farm journals to the readers of these periodicals. Would the President of the United States be willing to withdraw the profits we now make upon our foreign mail, and increase the rate of postage upon that dear old family paper, The Ladies' Home Journal, admired so much by our mothers, wives, and daughters, and then increase the price of this paper to its readers? Would he withdraw the profits we are now making upon our foreign mail, and increase the rate of postage upon all lodge organs and religious periodicals, and increase the price of these papers to their readers, so as to build up the interest of a few shipowners in this country?

I submit to gentlemen on that side of the House or upon this side of the House the unfairness of this proposition. So far as I am individually concerned, I refuse to vote an increased rate of postage upon second-class matter, because I know full well that this would increase the price of newspapers and magazines to the people. At least, Mr. Chairman, I refuse to vote any increased rate of postage upon second-class matter until other propositions are figured out and a true inventory of the situation taken and we are able to see where the Post-Office Department is. I refuse to do it, even though the President be unable to force through this Congress his unjust, unholy, and unrighteous ship-subsidy scheme. [Applause.] The President and the Postmaster-General both bottom their case upon the lone proposition that the deficit is due to the low rate of postage upon second-class mail matter. I refuse to bottom the case upon that proposition alone. The Postmaster-General in his report says that during the year 1909 we lost the following amounts upon the following classes of mail, to wit:

Third-class mail	$3,229,522.22
Free congressional mail	518,385.45
Free departmental mail	5,219,661.65
From registry service	3,878,524.61
From money-order service	68,392.74
Total loss in handling of this mail	12,914,486.57

Deducting this amount from the deficit leaves a deficit of $4,565,283.85. This would represent the true deficit if everything that went through the mails had been posted as the law requires it to be posted. No man can say, or no man can figure, the exact relation existing between first and second class mail. No man can say, or no man will even venture to say, that the Government last year would have made the handsome profit of $53,674,194.62 out of first-class mail if we had not had such an enormous quantity of second-class mail. It is unfair to separate the mails and charge up the deficit only to one class. The only fair way to treat the Post-Office is to treat it as an entirety and all the mail handled by it as a unit, and treating it in this light, giving the Government credit for the amount of mail which it handled free of postage, the deficit is now only a little more than $4,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that overpayment to the railroads for the transportation of mail is largely responsible for the present postal deficit, but in making this statement I desire to exonerate not only the chairman of the committee, but the entire committee, because the appropriation carried in this bill for railroad transportation is based upon law.

The law governing railway mail transportation was passed in 1872, amended in 1876, and in 1878, and in 1907. From 1878 to 1907, a period of twenty-eight years, there was no reduction in railway mail pay, although during this period of time freight rates were constantly being hammered down. But before we can determine as to whether or not the railroads are being overpaid, Congress must be furnished with some tangible facts along this line. In 1872 Congress passed a law giving the Postmaster-General power to call upon the railroads for information showing the exact cost to the railroads for the transportation of mail, but this act, although nearly forty years old, has been a dead letter upon the books. I understand that the Postmaster-General has recently called upon the railroads for this information, and that it will soon be forthcoming, but when it comes it must be remembered that it is information coming from the railroads themselves, but for one I welcome even their side of the case, with the hope that it will give Congress some light upon this important question. The railroads, for the transportation of mail, are paid by the pound, and the following schedule shows the rate of pay to the railroads for this service:

Schedule of rates for railway-mail pay.

Average weight of mails per day carried over whole length of route.	Pay per mile per annum. Act of March 3, 1873.	Act of July 12, 1876.	Act of June 17, 1878.	Act of March 2, 1907.	Land-grant railroads.	Intermediate weight warranting allowance of $1 per mile under the law.

I do not wish to be harsh or hard upon the railroads, but I wish to be generous and just to them. They are entitled to reasonable compensation for the transportation of the mail. This they are entitled to; no more and no less. If they are being overpaid, the people have a right to know it and to object to it. The people have a right to call upon Congress, upon its committees, upon the Postmaster-General, to investigate this question and see whether or not they are receiving more pay than they ought to receive. This bill carries an appropriation of $46,620,000 for the transportation of mail by the railroads for the year 1911.

But, Mr. Chairman, while we do not have correct data from the railroads or from any other source showing the actual cost to them of the transportation of the mail, yet we have other data at hand, figures that, in my judgment, are nearly accurate.

Since the President's message was sent to Congress upon this proposition, the country has become aroused upon it as never before; and if his message has done nothing else it has stimulated the country to call the attention of Congress to this one fact.

I do not know what relation exists between express companies and railroads. There are many similarities between the two and some dissimilarities. It is a known, undisputed fact, to which there are, in my judgment, no exceptions whatever, that within a given radius express companies take second-class matter and transport it at less than 1 cent per pound, and 1 cent per pound is the rate of postage paid by the publisher upon second-class mail matter. Now, what is this radius or haul? There is not much dispute upon this proposition by all concerned when it is followed out to its last and final analysis. As I said a moment ago, all unanimously agree on the proposition that within a radius of 500 miles express companies do haul and transport second-class mail matter at a cost less than 1 cent per pound.

Mr. Wilder, speaking for the magazines, before our committee, fixed the radius of haul at 620 miles. You can take the Postmaster-General's own report upon this point, and, leaving out of his report the haul of magazines, he fixes the average haul for all second-class matter not to exceed 655 miles, and magazines only constitute 20 per cent of second-class mail matter, so we have the unanimous agreement that express companies within a haul of 500 miles do haul second-class matter less than 1 cent per pound; and Mr. Wilder, an expert, who fixes the average haul for second-class matter at 620 miles, and the Postmaster-General practically fixing it at 655 miles, the difference is too slight between all of these gentlemen to even raise a question. I think it can be safely taken that express companies are to-day transporting second-class matter throughout the United States at a price less than 1 cent per pound.

How do the express companies do this? How are they able to accomplish this feat? The best and most reliable information which I can procure is that the railroads take one-half, or charge the express companies one-half, of the gross amount of the haul, leaving the other half to the express companies.

Mr. FASSETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX of Indiana. With pleasure.

Mr. FASSETT. I do not want to interrupt, but since we were in committee I discovered a report of the express companies made to the Wolcott commission, containing the express contract, and if you will allow me, I will state what it is.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If it is not too long.

Mr. FASSETT. There is a guaranteed minimum to the railroad by every express company. With that as a working basis, the railroad company takes 40 per cent of the business and the express companies 60 per cent unless the 40 per cent goes beneath the minimum. When it goes above the minimum the railroad company takes 40 per cent.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I read the report myself, but, be that as it may, there is no one questions for a moment but what express companies are making enormous sums of money by hauling second-class mail matter and hauling it for less than 1 cent a pound, while we are paying the railroads for hauling the same class of matter from 3 to 4 cents a pound. I read a statement in one of the newspapers the other day that the Wells Fargo Express Company, in New York, on the 1st day of last January declared a dividend of 300 per cent to its stock owners, and Mr. Curtis, who was before our committee on behalf of the Ladies' Home Journal, and Mr. Seitz, representing the New York World, both testified that they used express companies to transport immense quantities of their commodities. It is a known fact from a business view point that express companies must haul this stuff below 1 cent per pound, otherwise the publishers would take their magazines and newspapers and put them in the post-office and let the Post-Office Department transport them to their destination. To the publisher of second-class matter it is a business proposition, pure and simple, and they transport their periodicals in such way as to save money upon the transportation; and if the express companies can haul it cheaper for them than they can get the Government to do it by paying to the Government 1 cent per pound postage, as a business proposition, they will transport by express or otherwise, in any way to save money. When it is a conceded fact that express companies are actually hauling second-class mail matter cheaper than 1 cent per pound, this is a conclusive proposition to my mind that the express companies are hauling it for less than 1 cent a pound, or less than the government postage rate upon it.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. The express companies get the short haul, and the Government gets the long haul, which is the most expensive and, of course, less profitable.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I doubt that statement. I have heard that quoted around here for the last two months, but I do not believe it at all, because I do not believe that it is true. I want to read from the postal service investigation of the railway mail pay, page 237, part 2, what is known as the "Wolcott commission," and I read from Prof. Henry C. Adams (formerly connected with the Ann Arbor University, of Ann Arbor, Mich., now statistician for the Interstate Commerce Commission, a man who is known and accepted as authority along these lines), and by a careful reading of Professor Adams's report one will soon be convinced of the untruth of the proposition that express companies get the short hauls and the railroad companies get the long hauls. Let me cite the gentleman from New York to some of his figures, found on page 237 of this report. From New York to Buffalo, the distance being 440 miles, it costs the Government $31.65 to transport a ton of mail over the railroads.

To transport a ton of freight, $7.80; to transport a ton of express, $12.50; it costs $1.58 to transport 100 pounds of mail, 39 cents to transport 100 pounds of freight, and 63 cents to transport 100 pounds of express.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman tell us whether or not the railroad companies make any distinction between second and first class mail, or whether they haul all mail the same?

Mr. COX of Indiana. It all goes by the pound.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. So far as the charge for space in a car is concerned, it would not apply to the bulk of mail, which is second-class mail.

Mr. GOULDEN. The express companies would get the short haul to Buffalo.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Now, I will continue reading, if the gentleman will wait a moment.

From New York to Chicago, a distance of about 1,000 miles, it costs $71.39 to transport a ton of mail. It costs $15 to transport a ton of freight, and it costs $25 to transport 1 ton of express.

Let us take a longer haul, from New York to San Francisco. That is about as long a route as you can get in the United States. From New York to San Francisco, by the New York Central, the Lake Shore, the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, the Union Pacific, and the Southern Pacific, to transport a ton of mail costs $265.63. To transport a ton of freight from New York to San Francisco costs $60, and to transport 1 ton of express from New York to San Francisco costs $135. To transport 100 pounds of mail from New York to San Francisco costs $15.28; to transport 100 pounds of freight costs $3, and to transport 100 pounds of express costs $6.75.

Mr. SULZER. Will my friend yield for a question?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes; for a question.

Mr. SULZER. Are these charges the cost to the railroad or to the shipper?

Mr. COX of Indiana. The cost to the railroad.

Mr. SULZER. Do they charge the shipper more?

Mr. COX of Indiana. No, indeed; it will be found by an examination of these tables that the railroads haul express for express companies from two to three times cheaper than they charge the Government for the hauling of the same kind of material. As an illustration, if the railroad was shipping from New York to San Francisco 1 ton of second-class mail matter, it would charge the Government for this service $265.63, provided it went in a railway post-office car and was shipped as mail, and the same railroad, if this same ton of second-class matter was shipped as freight, would charge the publishers $60 for transporting this ton of second-class matter from New York to San Francisco, and if the publisher saw fit to send a ton of second-class matter from New York to San Francisco by express, the railroads would haul this ton of second-class matter for the express companies for $135, and I believe that this is almost a universal rule, that the railroad companies charge the Government, two, three, and four times as much for transportation of mail by the Government than it charges a private shipper or an express company for the same service and the same haul.

Mr. SULZER. Why is there such a difference between the cost to the shipper and the cost to the Government?

Mr. COX of Indiana. That is exactly the question that I am trying to solve, and I believe I must confess my inability to solve until the law is amended in some way.

Mr. SULZER. Is not that the whole trouble?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I think it is absolutely. I think that is the "nigger in the woodpile," so far as the deficit is concerned.

Mr. SULZER. Then let us get at it and root it out.

Mr. FASSETT. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman compared the cost to the Government of the United States for railway mail transportation with the cost in Canada to the Canadian government for railway mail transportation, and also the cost in Germany and France and England?

Mr. COX of Indiana. To some extent I have; and in response to that, in addition to what the chairman of our committee said to-day, as I understand the law of Canada it classifies mail as first-class freight, and it is transported as such, and this has been the law since 1865.

Mr. FASSETT. It costs about twice as much in Canada as it does here.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is not my information at all; it is less than half of what it costs us in this country.

Mr. FASSETT. Oh, no; it is twice as much.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Now, so far as Germany, France, Switzerland, Italy, and Austria are concerned, it is hard to compare those countries with the United States for the reason that in those countries the railroads are owned by the Government, at least the trunk lines; but even before that occurred, which, if I am correct in my history, began in 1865, the railroads in Germany, France, Switzerland, Italy, and Austria-Hungary carried the mails free, unless the government required an extra postal car to be put on for extraordinary services, in which case, so far as Germany was concerned, they were paid from 8 to 10 cents per car-mile, and, so far as France was concerned, about 1 cent a mile.

Mr. SMITH of California. And that is true to-day, is it not, in those countries?

Mr. COX of Indiana. It is true to-day, very largely, with this exception: In Switzerland the Government does not own all of the lines of railroads, and they have this kind of a law, that where the stock of the railroads earns 3½ per cent to the stockholders, then the railroads must haul the mails free over those lines. If the stock does not pay the stockholders 3½ per cent annual dividend, then they are paid what it is fairly worth to haul the mail.

Mr. SMITH of California. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to get him back to that comparison he made a short time ago, bring his attention again to the comparison he made between the cost of carrying the mail across the continent and the cost of freight and express. What was the figure which he gave as the freight rate across the continent?

Mr. COX of Indiana. From New York to San Francisco?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes; and what was the commodity?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Oh, it is classed as first-class freight, whatever that is. I am no shipper. I have always understood first-class freight to mean perishable freight. From New York to San Francisco the freight rate was $60 a ton, and if the gentleman recollects, that is about what the proof showed it to be before our committee.

Mr. SMITH of California. Of course the gentleman knows there are as many freight rates between San Francisco and New York, practically, as there are commodities shipped.

Mr. COX of Indiana. That is first-class freight.

Mr. SMITH of California. The classification of freight produces as many rates as commodities. For instance, we ship oranges from California to New York for $23 a ton and raisins for $35 a ton, and we ship various kinds of fruits at various rates; but the thing to which I wish to direct attention is this—and I am sure the gentleman wants to be quite fair with the House——

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do.

Mr. SMITH of California. And he would not risk his reputation by endeavoring to deceive the House. Does the gentleman honestly believe from his examination of the railroad end of the postal question that there is any element of fairness in a comparison of the amount for mail and freight, measured by the item of weight?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do.

Mr. SMITH of California. Does the gentleman think that the item of weights is the controlling factor in the cost of mail?

Mr. COX of Indiana. It may be; it is one of the items.

Mr. SMITH of California. When it is admitted that the average amount of weight put into a mail car is only about two and a half tons, and that in carrying that amount of mail they carry a dead equipment that equals 75 per cent of the weight of mail. What I want to bring to the attention of the gentleman is, and I think he will agree with me, that no man on earth can figure out a fair basis of pay between the railroad and the Government on the item of weight, because weight is not a controlling factor. A postal car is a moving office.

Mr. COX of Indiana. It may be so; I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. SMITH of California. I think you will admit a postal car is not a freight car at all; it is a moving office.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I object, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman making a speech. I do not object to yielding for a question.

Mr. SMITH of California. I think I have made my point clear.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has given from the Walcott report three rates—one express, one freight, and one mail. His speech will be widely read and quoted, and the gentleman ought to place in there a statement to the effect that since the Walcott report was made and the mail rate across the country given there has been a reduction in mail pay, so that the reader who reads his speech all over the country may know there has been a reduction in mail pay since the figures he gives were made.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I quite agree with the gentleman from Kansas on that point, but still, when we take into consideration the enormous increased volume of mail from 1872 down to 1907, I doubt very much whether there has been a decrease or a reduction of railway mail pay. We must recollect that during that interval of time the weight of mails have trebled and quadrupled in this country from 1878 to 1907; so, taking the enormous increase in the volume of mail which occurred during this period of time, even if there was a reduction in 1907, it was not a proportionate reduction to what it ought to have been, corresponding to the increased volume of mail.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I would like to have twenty minutes more.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman twenty minutes additional.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has given any attention to the question as to what the largest tonnage in mail ever has been in any one car?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Oh, I should say 2½, 3½, or 4 tons to the car.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the largest tonnage that has ever been carried on any one express car?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I have no data upon that at all.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any difference whether they haul 2½ or 12½ tons in the cost of hauling?

Mr. COX of Indiana. In the case of the larger amount the railroads would make more money.

Mr. MADDEN. No; the question is, Could not the railroad company haul 12½ tons at a cheaper price per ton than it could haul 2½ tons?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Oh, I think they could.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think because it only hauls 2½ tons on any one car that has anything to do with the cost of the Government for the amount of mail? Does the gentleman think that enters into the question at all?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I think it does. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, as I said a while ago, there is some line of similarity between the handling of express and the handling of mail. The express companies hire their own messengers to take care of the express matter. The railroads are at no expense in the handling of express matter, and they are at a very small expense in the handling of mail in the car, except the hauling of the car, because the Government puts in the car railway postal employees to care for and handle the mail while it is en route. Both cars—the one an express car, the other a railway post-office car—are run in the same train, pulled by the same power, and manned by the same crew of men. I would not contend that railroads can transport mail as cheaply as they can either freight or express, because they are at some additional expense in the transportation of mail which they are not put to in the transportation of either express or freight—for instance, where the post-office is within 80 rods of the depot the railroads are required to deliver the mail from the depot to the post-office and return it again to the depot. What this amounts to I do not know, nor do I have the means of knowing, but I would say, as compared to the total amount of money paid to the railroads for the transportation of mail, that the amount is indeed negligible; but I do insist that when the railroads charge the Government from two to four times more for transporting second-class matter than it charges either express companies or private shippers that this is an overcharge on the part of the railroads, and that they are getting too much for hauling the mail.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I would like to ask the gentleman this question, to which I presume he has paid attention, and that is whether or not second-class mail has to be handled in the car en route; whether a car transporting second-class mail is supposed to be a post-office on wheels; and if mail has not to be handled in transit, and whether that applies to freight and express?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I can answer the gentleman from the testimony given before our committee, and this showed that practically all of second-class matter was routed in bulk by the publishers at the time of publication, and that they delivered the matter in bulk to the railroads, and that this bulk matter was then transported by the railroads to some distributing center, and that the bulk was not broken while en route until it reached the distributing center; but I take it that this would make no difference, because after the mail reaches the railroad, the railroad has nothing at all to do with the handling of it or with the distribution of it—this being done by the Post-Office Department through its railway postal employees.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. It can go right along the same as express matter, without being handled?

Mr. COX of Indiana. This is true, and it is exactly what is done. The express companies, through their express messengers, handle the express matter while en route by their own employees, and the Government handles the mail while en route by its employees free of any charge to the railroad.

Mr. SMITH of California. The gentleman does not intend to convey the impression, however, that magazines, except in a few extraordinary cases, move in carload lots to their final destination? I suppose there may be carloads of magazines starting from New York to Chicago——

Mr. COX of Indiana. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. SMITH of California (continuing). But a carload going to California would ultimately be broken up on the train and distributed.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The gentleman recalls what Mr. Wilder said about this before our committee—that a carload of magazines going to the Pacific coast would not be broken up until the car reached the State of Washington, where the bulk load would be broken up and the magazines sent to the distributing centers on the coast for distribution.

Mr. CULLOP. If it were not broken up, it would not cost the railroads any more?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Not a penny more. I am not talking about the cost to the Government for the transportation and distribution of second-class matter. I know it costs the Government more to distribute it than it does to hire the railroads to haul it. What I am trying to discuss and get before this committee is the cost to the Government in the transportation of second-class matter over the railroads, or, in other words, the amount of money we pay the railroads for hauling the mail.

Mr. Chairman, there is another item in this bill that I want to discuss for a moment, and that is the amount of money we are paying the railroads as rent or royalty upon their post-office cars, and while this bill carries an item of $5,670,000 as pay for railway post-office cars, I am not criticising this item, because it is based upon law, but I am criticising the law upon which it is based, and I am criticising the Postmaster-General of the United States and all of his immediate predecessors, together with the Presidents, in failing to call the attention of Congress to this statute and asking Congress to amend and modify the law so as to reduce the appropriation upon this item. The law upon which this item is based, in my judgment, can not be defended upon the ground of good conscience, justice, or economy, and, Mr. Chairman, I have introduced a bill, which is now pending before our committee, which proposes to reduce the pay upon this item one-half, and I propose to follow it up before our committee and see if we can not get it enacted into law.

There was carried in the post-office bill in the year 1909 $4,800,000 as pay for lease or royalty upon the railway post-office cars. At that time there were 1,342 railway post-office cars in use in this country on the railroads. Dividing the amount we paid the railroads by the total number of railway post-office cars we find we paid the railroads $3,575.10 for each postal car.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will.

Mr. CULLOP. And did you ascertain what the cost of one of those cars was?

Mr. COX of Indiana. To the best of our ability.

Mr. CULLOP. What was it?

Mr. COX of Indiana. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General, testifying before our committee, said that the average cost of a wooden post-office car was between $6,500 and $7,500.

Mr. CULLOP. Did you then further ascertain what the life-time of one of these cars is?

Mr. COX of Indiana. About ten years.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman permit a question? How many apartment cars were in the service at that time?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not know. But I do know that we do not pay anything to the railroads as a lease or royalty on an apartment car, and the proof showed that one-half of the total mail of the United States is transported in apartment cars.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman permit me to state——

Mr. COX of Indiana. No; I prefer that the gentleman make his own speech. I will yield for a question, however.

Mr. Chairman, no business man on earth could stand for paying $3,575.10 upon a $7,000 investment each year; and this is exactly what it amounts to, for a car which costs the railroads $7,000 we pay them each year for the use of this car $3,575.10. This is equal to more than 50 per cent each year upon their investment. Although we are paying to the railroads annually $3,575.10 for the use of each railway post-office car, this is in addition to the railway pay for the transportation of mail; yet the railroad companies get no pay whatever from express companies in the way of royalty or lease, and haul for the express companies from two to four times cheaper than they charge the Government for the transportation of mail, and still make money out of their part of the profits made by express companies. The Post-Office Department only requires a 40-foot space in a railway post-office car, and many of the railroads are now building 70-foot railway post-office cars. This leaves 30 feet of the car to be used by the railroads in either carrying express or baggage, and this very thing the railroads are doing in hundreds of instances to-day, and the people are paying for a part of the car now being used by the railroads in which to transport baggage or express. It would require a sum of money equal to $59,585 loaned out at 6 per cent to bring in each year $3,575.10, and I undertake to say that an average cost of constructing one mile of railroad in this country by grading, putting cross-ties upon it, with steel rails, ready for locomotives, and trains of cars to pass over it, does not equal upon an average the sum of $59,585.

Neither the United States Steel Trust, although incorporated for $1,400,000,000, nor the Standard Oil Company, at the head of which is the greatest magnate upon the earth, John D. Rockefeller, could stand this constant drain; yet the Government of the United States for the last forty years has been standing it. How the Government can endure it, gentlemen of the committee, is more than I can understand, and I fear that Uncle Sam will soon stagger under this load.

Mr. CULLOP. Will my colleague permit another question?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will.

Mr. CULLOP. You have then solved the question as to why the railroad companies just before each national election give out the order of coercion that their employees must vote the Republican ticket or they will quit the business.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I thank the gentleman for that statement, which is true. In addition to that——

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman permit me there?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I take it for granted that the law of 1873 as amended by the act of 1878, fixing the pay of mail to the railroads of this country, together with the law of 1872, giving to the railroads a lease for their cars, must be exceedingly satisfactory to the railroads, or else, in my judgment, they would be beseeching Congress day in and day out to have these laws repealed or amended and they be given more for their service.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of California. I wanted my question to follow the remark of your colleague.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Ask it, then.

Mr. SMITH of California. I will ask if at the time when all branches of the Government were in the hands of the Democratic party it was not just the same?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I am not injecting any politics in this discussion. I am trying to discuss some of the evils.

Mr. SMITH of California. And I am not, either.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If you want it, I will bring it in.

Mr. SMITH of California. The remark of your colleague injected that.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I refuse to have my time consumed in that way. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Indiana is abundantly able to take care of himself, here or any other place.

Mr. SMITH of California. He is taking care of you, I trust.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not need him or anyone else to help take care of me. I think I am abundantly able to do this myself. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, we have reached a serious point. It is a condition and not a theory confronting us to-day, and a condition that appeals to every Member of this House, because if we wipe out the postal deficit, under the recommendation of the President and the Postmaster-General, by increasing the rate of postage upon second-class matter, this inevitably means an increase in the price of all newspapers and magazines to their readers, something for which I am unalterably opposed. Rather than to increase the rate of postage upon second-class matter, I am in favor of going to the bottom of the entire situation and "fight it out along these lines" if it takes all summer, and in going to the bottom of it, let us see if we are not overpaying the railroad for hauling the mail. In my judgment, if we do this we will soon find that the cause, or one of the large causes, of our large postal deficit is due to overpayment of the railroads. I know the railroads meet this argument and say that they transport free of charge the railway postal clerks; but at the same time they transport free of charge express messengers on the same trains, and that both railroads and express companies make enormous profits out of these hauls of second-class matter there is no doubt. I listened attentively this morning to the able argument made by the chairman of this committee insisting that the Post-Office Department should be put upon strictly a business basis, with a business man placed at the head of it. I thoroughly agree with him on this proposition, and I agree with him that we ought to have a business man at the head of it, and that the Post-Office Department should be taken out of the domain of politics. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You never will put the post-office upon a paying basis until you put a business man at its head, and put it upon business principles instead of political principles. This was the opinion of Mr. Wilder, and it was one of the things he advised doing.

I read from the Washington Post of January 27:

HITCHCOCK'S QUEST VAIN—WALL STREET'S PURSES CLOSED TO REPUBLICAN APPEALS, SAYS REPORT.

[Special to the Washington Post.]

NEW YORK, January 27, 1910.

A Washington dispatch to the New York World says:

"The Republican national committee wishes this year to assist the Republican congressional committee with funds, and it became known to-day that Postmaster-General Hitchcock, former chairman of the national committee and still its actual head, went to New York ten days ago to see what could be done. He returned empty handed, having been told that the antitrust programme of the administration would not open Wall street pocketbooks.

* * * * * * *

"But money is still needed, and Mr. Hitchcock and Frederick W. Upham, western treasurer of the Republican committee, were almost constantly together during the latter's short visit here. Mr. Upham left for Chicago to-day after a talk with the President."

How do you expect to put a business man at the head of a great institution like the Post-Office Department, with its head serving the dominant political party as its national chairman? I agree the Post-Office Department ought to be reorganized, but not along political lines.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman from Indiana state who is the chairman of the Republican national executive committee at this time?

Mr. COX of Indiana. The national committee?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I understand Mr. Hitchcock, the Postmaster-General.

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, no; General Hitchcock resigned the chairmanship of the national committee about the time he entered President Taft's Cabinet.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I understand he has tentatively resigned, but that he is still its actual head, still its vitality, its director, and its power behind the throne, and that he is now using all the post-office patrongage to direct the course of the Republican party.

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Chairman, this resignation is on the same level as that of Mr. Ellis, who recently resigned a position in the Attorney-General's office to become manager of the Republican party's campaign in Ohio, is it not?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I think it about on a parity with it. Mr. Chairman, I now read from a clipping from the Louisville Post of January 17, a Republican organ:

In the Louisville Times of Friday, January 14, there appeared a special telegram over which we have been pondering for forty-eight hours in a vain hope of answering the question, Who is actual President of the United States? In order to invite the assistance of our readers, we publish the telegram entire:

"FIELD COMING HOME.

[The Times correspondence.]

"WASHINGTON, January 14, 1910.—Having received official confirmation that his nomination as collector of internal revenue at Lexington will go to the Senate shortly, T. A. Field, of Ashland, left for home early to-day. The assurance of his selection for Collector S. J. Roberts's place was given with the sanction of Postmaster-General Hitchcock at the White House."

What puzzles us is why it should be necessary for the White House to get from Postmaster-General Hitchcock sanction for any announcement the White House cared to make.

"Out West" we have considered the President a bigger man than any P. M. G. Studying the Constitution, the President seems a big feature in the new scheme of government, and there is no mention of a Postmaster-General. Studying history, we have found all members of the Cabinet subordinate to the White House. All formal announcements of the President's purpose have come from the White House; at least when a Cabinet minister made any statement it carried with it the sanction of the White House.

Now it is all changed. Before the President can inform an applicant for a position in the Internal Revenue Bureau, Treasury Department, he must get the sanction not of the Secretary of the Treasury but of the Postmaster-General.

Evidently "things" have changed since Roosevelt went hunting, and they have not changed for the better.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Has it not been reported that the Postmaster-General was using his political influence in the Post-Office Department to drive the so-called "progressives" back into line?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Of course it has. If the newspapers of this city can be believed at all, they have teemed with reports to the effect that the appointments of postmasters were being withheld because certain Members upon that side of the House refused to line up with the regular organization. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, no man can serve two masters at the same time. We are commanded by the divine law to render unto Cæsar that which belongs to Cæsar and unto God that which belongs to God. No man can serve as Postmaster-General of the United States, and give to the people that full degree of efficient service which the people have a right to demand of him, and at the same time serve as the head and master of a great political party. But we all recollect distinctly how the steam roller rolled over every aspirant for the Presidency at the Chicago convention in 1908, and how the present Postmaster-General was unerringly directing its work; and as a result of that performance we now have the spectacular example of seeing the Postmaster-General, tentatively at the head of the Republican party, dispensing patronage to the faithful who stood by him in the log-rolling process at Chicago instead of attending to his duties as Postmaster-General. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, at the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WEISSE] I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a table of prices from La Follette's Magazine. I do not know anything about them except that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WEISSE] left them with me, with that request.

Mr. MANN. I shall have to object to any request to insert things in the RECORD where they are not connected with the continuation of a speech.

Mr. BORLAND. I am making this request at the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WEISSE].

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] ten minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Chairman, a member of another body, speaking of the prices of farm products on February 4, 1910, said:

* * * I had a meat man a short time ago give me an estimate of what a 4-year-old steer would bring if served at one of the restaurants here in the city of Washington at these rates, taking all the items that you find in this list, and he estimated that it would bring from $2,000 to $3,000. The farmer's price is about $60 to $80, with all the four years' work that he expended upon that steer. With the little additional work—thirty minutes in the city of Chicago and transporting him here to the city of Washington and cooking him at your café—he advances from $70 to $2,500 or $3,000, enough to pay half the price of a farm.

* * * That represents his work upon it. Now, I want any man to compare the amount of energy expended in producing a bushel of wheat on the farm with the amount of energy expended in transporting that wheat to the city of Minneapolis or to Chicago, grinding it into flour, transporting it to the bakery, and converting it into bread. I think you will find that there has been at least double the amount of energy expended in producing it than was expended upon it after it left the farmer's hands. And yet, taking the average price that the baker receives, say 5 cents a loaf, you will find that that bushel has advanced from 90 cents to $3.75 a bushel, or an increase of 400 per cent.

If it is desired to ascertain what the consumer pays for meats and other products raised, say, in North Dakota, why not give the prices paid for meats at representative retail markets by 99 per cent of the people.

I have taken some pains to ascertain the facts. To show how impossible it is to get $2,500 out of a carcass of beef, I will take an 800-pound carcass of best corn-fed beef. Every ounce of that carcass would have to be porterhouse or tenderloin steak and sell at $3.33 a pound to bring $2,500. As a matter of fact, not more than 6 or 7 per cent of that carcass can be served for best steaks in first-class restaurants; and as nearly as I can ascertain, that 6 or 7 per cent is served at the rate of about $1 per pound, which includes the accessories, for which no charge is made when you order a steak.

Of the balance of the carcass, the best hotels and restaurants can use more or less at very much lower prices; but much of the carcass can not be used to advantage, and there is a large percentage of waste. However, figuring that all parts of the carcass of beef could be used in the best restaurants, and figuring all the usable parts at their proportionate value, I am, upon the best information I can get, unable to see how it could bring much over $250, which, as before stated, would include all the accessories, for which no charge is made.

One of the large New England markets has given me the results of a test of a carcass of beef weighing 816 pounds, which netted them $91.14. This carcass of beef, they said, was bought by them at least 1 cent under the market by reason of a weakness in prices at the time of the arrival of the shipment. If they had paid 10 cents per pound, which was the nominal market price, they would have made a gross profit of about 10½ per cent, and inasmuch as it costs them more than 14 per cent to do a retail business, they would have lost money on it, selling it at their present retail prices, and their expense of doing business is probably less than that of any other similar concern in New England. It is seldom that a retail business in their line can be done at less than 18 per cent, and frequently it costs about 20 per cent. They probably could not make any margin on meats under present conditions of the market at present retail prices if they always had to pay the nominal market price. It is only by watching for every opportunity everywhere that they are able to make a small margin. By buying this particular carcass 1 cent under the market they made a gross profit of 19½ per cent.

Now, as to the packers' profit on this carcass, the following schedule will give a pretty clear indication of how narrow are the margins on which beef is handled all along the line. I quote for the live steer—the Chicago market—and I believe the figures given are fairly accurate. Anyone can, of course, obtain from reliable trade papers the daily quotations of both live cattle and dressed beef in Chicago and elsewhere. I can not give the farm price of the steer, but knowing the live cost in Chicago, you can readily judge what probable profit there may be between the farm and the packer, or what the packer pays the feeder or commission man at the stock yards:

1,360 pound live-weight steer, at 7 cents per pound		$95.20
Result of sale.
816-pound carcass of beef, at 9 cents	$73.44
80 pounds hide, at 13 cents	10.40
1 liver	.50
75 pounds tallow, at 8 cents	6.00
Tongue, heart, tail, etc	1.10
Fertilizer material	1.00
		92.44
Apparent loss to the packer		2.76

Sixty per cent of beef is the accepted ratio of yield.

It was, of course, expected that this carcass of beef would bring the packer at least 10 cents per pound in this market, and in that case it would have shown a gross profit of $5.36—this to cover packing-house expense, freight to New England, and selling cost there.

This illustrates, I believe, the general condition in the meat trade, excepting that all retailers can not buy quite as low as the New England market I am quoting, nor do they sell at as low prices, so that probably the margin of profit is about the same in either case.

The fact is that the short supply of food animals, and not the exorbitant profits realized by those engaged in the industry, is responsible for the present high prices. From reliable sources I learn that the high point in the supply of the different kinds of food animals was as follows:

	Head.
1907, cattle	72,533,996
1908, hogs	56,084,000
1903, sheep	63,964,876

Compared with the current supply, the decrease has been as follows:

	Head.
Cattle	3,453,996
Hogs	8,302,000
Sheep	6,748,876
Total	18,504,872

The aggregate decrease of food animals in the United States since 1903 amounts to 18,504,872 head, and during that time the population has probably increased 10,000,000, more or less.

Hogs bring nearly twice as much to-day as they did in 1908 and almost as much as at the high point in 1882, and the price is increasing from day to day. The natural consequence is that pork is high, and pork is a large element in the bill of fare of the mass of the people.

Now, let us see about the profit on wheat.

I believe that the government crop report gives the average farm value of wheat for 1909 at $1.02. Five bushels of wheat are, I think, the accepted quantity figured for a barrel of flour. We all pay for bread flour according to grade, and, governed by seasons and the condition of the market, all the way from $5 to $7 per barrel. I give below the tests on two barrels of flour:

TEST NO. 1.

350 loaves of bread, at 3 cents a loaf		$10.50
Less estimated shrinkage of 10 per cent for stale bread		1.05
Leaving		9.45
Manufacturing cost.
Barrel of flour	$5.40
3 pounds salt	.02
1½ pounds yeast	.38
16 quarts milk	.95
3½ pounds lard	.35
3½ pounds sugar	.18
Malt extract	.08
Bakery labor	1.50
		8.86
Gross gain		.59

TEST NO. 2.

300 loaves of bread, at 5 cents a loaf		$15.00
Less estimated shrinkage of 10 per cent for stale bread		1.50
Leaving		13.50
Manufacturing cost.
Barrel of flour	$6.20
3 pounds salt	.02
1½ pounds yeast	.38
25 quarts milk	1.50
3½ pounds lard	.35
3½ pounds sugar	.18
Bakery labor	1.50
Gross gain		3.37

The cost of retailing bread is far beyond the average retail cost of other merchandise by reason of innumerable 3 and 5 cent sales, and I am informed that it can not be done in a first-class store for less than 20 per cent and probably much more. It will, therefore, be seen that on low-priced bread there would be a considerable loss, which is offset by the profit on the better grade.

The total gain on these two barrels of flour was $4.16, and the total sales were $22.95, showing a gross gain of about 18 per cent, or less than is usually conceded to be the cost of retailing. I am informed that a bakery can not be conducted in expensive locations in the retail section of our cities except as an incident to help bring other business.

Very large baking establishments in large cities can perhaps reduce the costs I have given materially, but they have to distribute through retailers, and the shrinkage on stale goods, I am told, is in some cases as high as 25 per cent or above. The deduction I draw is that except in very favorable cases, there is no profit for the retailer, and the margin must be narrow for the manufacturer.

RECESS.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of half past 5 having arrived, the committee will stand in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, at 8 o'clock p. m. the committee resumed its session, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WEISSE].

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. That leave has already been granted by the House.

Mr. WEISSE submitted the following extract from La Follette's:

WHY PRICES ARE SOARING—ANY INVESTIGATION INTO THE INCREASED COST OF LIVING MUST INCLUDE THE RECENT REVISION-UPWARD TARIFF LAW.

[By Clyde H. Tavenner.]

Why is the cost of living increasing so fast in the United States?

For two months discussion over this question has been raging like a blizzard of words, the zone of discontent over the 11 per cent increase in the cost of living during the last year extending from Maine to Florida and from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

There have been "investigations" galore. But there seems to be a disposition on the part of some investigators, at least, to avoid looking into any corners where there is the remotest possibility of finding the real cause of the agitation.

President Taft declares the increase in the cost of living is due to the "proportionate increase in the output of gold." Secretary of Agriculture Wilson, at the behest of Senator ALDRICH and others of the high priests of protection, made an "investigation" for the purpose of whitewashing the recent revision-upward tariff law and fastening the blame on the corner grocer.

There are other "investigations" in progress. Every one of them, however, has studiously avoided taking into consideration the Dingley law and its still more infamous successor, the Payne-Aldrich-Cannon law.

The only place where there is any doubt as to what is the chief cause of the increase in the cost of living in the United States is in our own country. The leading political economists of the world agree almost without a dissenting voice that the cost of living is increasing more than four and one-half times faster in the United States than Great Britain, owing to our policy of maintaining excessive import duties.

The protectionists of the United States are practically the only protectionists who refuse to concede that the import duty is paid by the consumer and not the foreigner. The leading protectionists of Europe tacitly admit that as a general rule the price of an article is enhanced by about the amount of the tariff.

TARIFF AFFECTS PRICES.

The writer attended a political meeting at Manchester, England, last summer, at which a workman interrupted a protectionist speaker to ask a question.

"If we should change our policy of free trade for one of protection, would not the cost of living be increased?" asked the workman.

"There is no doubt about that," replied the speaker, frankly. "But you must take into consideration the fact that if the manufacturer can charge more for his products, he can and will pay higher wages, and you will not mind the increased prices."

When the German Government introduced its tariff law of 1902, it published with it, as is the custom in Germany, a printed explanation of the reasons for its introduction. This official document, which squarely declares that import duties raise the cost of living, reads, in part, as follows:

"A means whereby the agricultural interests are enabled to cover their cost of production is to be found, under the given circumstances, by creating a factor which will determine the inland selling price through relative protective duties. Inland prices are raised, so far as a consideration of the circumstances of the last ten years will allow us to judge, in proportion to the duties."

In France, Italy, and some other European countries a part of the municipal revenue is raised by duties on goods entering the towns. At the gates of such towns there is an official who collects this tax, and it is found that the difference in prices of articles purchased outside of the towns and within the towns is in nearly every instance exactly the amount of the duty. The same happens in trade between nations.

In Holland there are no import duties on food or raw materials, the sole protective element being a tax of 5 per cent on imported manufactured goods. In Germany there is a high duty on food and an excessive tariff on all the necessaries of life. A household of six persons can buy for $5.04 in Gelderland (one of the eastern Provinces of Holland) the necessaries of life which in Germany, just across the frontier, would cost $6.78. As a result a village of 4,000 inhabitants has grown up at Glanerbrug, near the German frontier. There German manufacturers have built houses for a colony of their workmen, because they can live more cheaply and better across the frontier in the foreign country, where there are practically no import duties.

CONSUMER PAYS THE TAX.

If an import duty does not enhance the price of an article, how do the protectionists account for the fact that the price of wheat in Germany is always equal or greater than the English or free-trade price by the amount of the German import duty on wheat?

After it is explained that the German duty on wheat is $2.84 a quarter (480 pounds), four paragraphs will suffice to convince even protectionists that at least in this instance the import duty is added to the price of the article taxed, and that instead of being paid by the "foreigner" it is paid by the consumer (the figures given were supplied by Mr. George Broomhall, an expert, and printed in the Economist, a journal of prominence in Great Britain):

1. At the beginning of August, 1908, the Berlin workman paid for a quarter of wheat $10.48. At that time the price of wheat per quarter in free-trade England was $7.64. Thus it will be seen that the Berlin consumer paid the free-trade English price and the amount of the tariff.

2. By the middle of October the Berlin consumer was paying $10.56 for his quarter of wheat, which represents $7.48, the average English price of wheat at the time, the German tariff of $2.84 and a shilling extra. This is an instance of how protection puts a fictitious value on an article. While the price of wheat fell in free-trade England, it increased in high-protection Germany.

3. At the end of November the price of wheat in Berlin was $11.04, which means that the Berlin consumer was paying the prevailing English price of $7.72, the tariff of $2.84 and 2 shillings extra. And even this is not all.

4. On March 10, 1909, the Berlin consumer was paying $11.78 for his quarter of wheat. This represented the prevailing English price of $8.36, the $2.84 tariff tax, and a 58-cent steal.

And under the Payne-Aldrich law the American consumer is being bled in the same manner every time he purchases an article on which there is an excessive tariff rate, such as sugar, clothing, blankets, farming implements, and some two thousand other articles too numerous to mention.

WHAT THE FIGURES SHOW.

Joseph Chamberlain, the British protectionist, in a speech at Glasgow, said:

"I propose to put no tax whatever on maize, because maize is a food of the very poorest of the people. I propose to exclude bacon from protection also, because bacon forms the staple food for many of the poorest of the population."

In other words, Mr. Chamberlain admitted that the import duty on maize and bacon would have to be paid by the consumer, and not the "foreigner."

Another question: If our protective system is not the "substantial" explanation of the abnormal increase in the cost of living in the United States, how does it come that British prices, under free trade, increased but 7.7 per cent in ten years, while American prices, under protection, increased 34.3 per cent?

Here is the table which tells its own story, and ought to be considered "Exhibit A" in any congressional or other investigation into the increased cost of living:

Year.	English prices.	United States prices.
1896	100.0	100.0
1897	104.4	104.6
1898	109.6	112.6
1899	105.1	117.2
1900	107.2	124.3
1901	107.6	126.3
1902	109.0	132.8
1903	108.0	127.8
1904	108.7	127.9
1906	107.7	134.3
Increase	7.7	34.3

These figures are calculated from official statistics of the British Board of Trade in the Eleventh Abstract of Labor Statistics, and from figures in the Seventy-first Bulletin of the United States Bureau of Labor.

The year 1896, which was the year preceding the enforcement of the highly protective Dingley tariff, is taken as the standard year, the cost of food in each country being taken as 100. The meaning of the table is that food which cost $1 in Great Britain in 1896 could not be duplicated for less than $1.077 in 1906, and that food for which the American consumer paid $1 in 1896 cost $1.343 in 1906.

A STRIKING COMPARISON.

Coming nearer home, the difference in the cost of living in Detroit and just across the river in Windsor, Canada, supplies us with a striking definition of the real meaning of excessive tariff rates. Prices of foodstuffs, wearing apparel, and rents average from 20 to 25 per cent more in Detroit than in Windsor. And between the two cities there are but 2,561 feet of water—and the Aldrich-Payne tariff bill!

The Detroit man is "protected," and the Windsor man is not.

By not being "protected," the Windsor man pays $15 for a suit of clothes that the Detroit man will find it difficult to duplicate in quality for $25. What the Windsor man is escaping in this instance is the Aldrich-Payne tax of 44 cents a pound on good all-wool clothes, and the additional tax of 60 per cent of the value of the goods.

While reading the following comparative prices, Mr. Reader, keep in mind that Detroit and Windsor are practically one city, that all in the world that separates them is the half mile of water—and the "revision upward" tariff wall:

Commodity.	Price in Windsor.	Price in Detroit.
Butter, best, per pound	$0.28	$0.36
Eggs, per dozen	.34	.42
Beef, cheapest cut, per pound	.06½	.10
Pork, mess, do	.13	.20
Lard, prime, do	.11	.13
Bacon, breakfast, do	.19	.24
Potatoes, per bushel	.70	.65
Cabbage, per head	$0.05–.07	$0.08–.15
Turnips, per bushel	.40	.60
Carrots, do	.50	.60
Rutabagas, do	.35	.40
Beets, do	.25	.60
Parsnips, do	.50	.60
Turkeys, dressed, per pound	.20	.25
Chickens, dressed, do	.11	.15
Milk, per quart	.07	.08–.09
Cheese, per pound	.11½	.16½
Plug tobacco, do	1.00	2.00-3.00

"But," protest the protectionists, "there has been an increase in the United States in the cost of many articles on which there is no tariff. Does not this show that protection is not the cause of the increase in the cost of living?"

Answering this question, Senator MOSES E. CLAPP, of Minnesota, says:

"You will hear it said constantly, with reference to something on which the price has been advanced, 'Oh, that isn't in the tariff at all. That increase has nothing to do with the tariff.' But the fact is that the tariff reaches all along the line. You can't raise the cost of living to a man who is producing something to sell without forcing that man to raise correspondingly the price of what he has to sell."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I shall take this opportunity to voice my protest against the proposition of giving subsidies to American ships. I desire the restoration of our foreign shipping trade as earnestly as any Member of this House, but I do not believe that this end can be accomplished by giving subsidies to the owners of private and individual interests. It is wrong in principle that the general public should be taxed to increase the profits of a special few now engaged in the shipping business. While the bill now pending before this Congress does not of itself contemplate the immediate spending of vast sums of money, yet it can not and it will not be successfully denied that the passage of the bill introduced by the gentleman from the State of Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], or any other ship-subsidy bill, is but an entering wedge which in the near future will be used as a precedent to extort millions of dollars from the Treasury of the United States to bolster up the profits of special enterprise.

We are confronted with a deficit, an ever-increasing deficit, and the highest tariff rates the history of the world has seen have not only increased the cost of living to the American people, but are proving wholly inadequate to produce revenue sufficient to meet the expenses of a government whose reckless extravagance causes uneasiness and concern to all thoughtful minds. With such a condition confronting us, is this the time to donate millions of dollars of the people's money to shipping interests because the owners of certain American vessels are not making satisfactory dividends on their capital invested? The merchant at the close of a year's business who fails to make a satisfactory profit is as much entitled to a subsidy as the man who owns a ship and fails to make the profit he expected.

While it is absolutely true that all foreign countries which have recklessly given away public moneys as donations to shipowners to build up their foreign shipping trade have found that their efforts have been worse than useless; while all this is absolutely true, yet, in the limited time at my disposal, I shall not go into that nor attempt to discuss this question in all its phases. I will endeavor to show to this House and to the country that the decline of our foreign merchant marine is due to two causes: First, the laws which forbid Americans to register in the United States ships built in foreign countries; and, second, by reason of a protective tariff.

The Humphrey bill makes a pretense of restoring free shipbuilding. Like many measures which come so frequently from the other side, it makes it possible for the rich to secure some benefit from this bill. These benefits apply only to steel vessels of certain tonnage. A steel vessel of not less than twenty-five hundred tons can be built abroad and registered in the United States, but even that vessel can not be used in domestic or coastwise trade without being forfeited to the Government; so this bill fails altogether to restore free shipping.

But free shipbuilding by itself can not build up our foreign marine trade unless the prohibitive tariff rates are materially reduced. Free shipping would undoubtedly stimulate this trade, for it would permit an American citizen to purchase his ship where he could get it the cheapest and then fly the American flag, which our laws now will not permit. Buying vessels abroad at 20 or 30 per cent less than they can be built here would, of course, place more ships in the American foreign trade.

The policies of the Republican party have killed our foreign shipping trade. Fifty years ago, when you secured control of the Government, our merchant marine was in the zenith of its prosperity. To-day by laws enacted by the Republican party, according to your own admission, it is dead. I shall show that in 1846, when the tariff was reduced, our foreign merchant marine, in both tonnage and business, increased with amazing rapidity. I shall show that when you got in power and began to enact your tariff laws, making all the people pay tribute to give special privileges to a favored few, our merchant marine went down. The pen that records the upward progress of your tariff rates has written the melancholy epitaph of American shipping upon the high seas. [Applause.]

As the tariff rate went down, the volume of our seagoing trade went up. As the tariff rate went up, the volume of our foreign shipping trade went down. When our country enjoyed a minimum tariff rate, it also enjoyed a maximum volume of foreign shipping trade. And to-day, when our land is groaning under a maximum tariff rate, we have a minimum volume of foreign shipping. When you took control American ships were carrying over 65 per cent of the value of our total exports and imports. Now, after forty years of Republican control, American ships are carrying less than 10 per cent of the value of our total exports and imports. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When you toook charge of the Government we had vessels of over two and a half million tons engaged in foreign trade. The tonnage of these vessels to-day is less than 1,000,000 tons. When you took charge of the Government American vessels had carried over $500,000,000 of our foreign commerce in one year. Now these vessels are carrying less than $275,000,000 of this commerce, while, at the same time, our foreign commerce increased over 400 per cent.

Robert J. Walker, probably the greatest authority on tariff legislation our country has produced, in 1845 said:

> American tonnage has not increased in the proportion as British tonnage in the last ten years. Even in the ports of the United States there has been a great increase of foreign vessels in the last few years. It is unprofitable under these circumstances to own vessels, and there is no other way for accounting for the depressed state of the shipping interest than that the tariff, in the first instance, enhances the cost of vessels and then cuts off their employment by prohibitory duties, which diminish imports and cripple commerce, while our greatest rival and competitor proclaims to the shipbuilders: "Take free of duty all that you require for your outfit."

Now note his prophecy: Carrying out the Democratic policy of refusing special privileges to a favored few the tariff was reduced in 1846. The very next year showed an increase of over 100,000 tons in our vessels engaged in foreign trade. In 1848 there was an increase over 1847 of 120,000 tons; in 1849 an increase over the preceding year of 90,000 tons; in 1850 an increase of over 180,000 tons; in 1855 there was an increase in the tonnage of American vessels engaged in foreign trade during the five years from 1850 to 1855 of over 900,000 tons; and in 1861, when you took charge, the vessels in our foreign shipping trade had increased from 943,307 tons in 1846, when we reduced the tariff, to 2,496,894 tons, an increase of tonnage during the fifteen years of tariff reduction of 1,553,587 tons. The first year that you took charge there was a decrease of over 300,000 tons. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, of course, some reduction of tonnage must be accounted for by the civil war; but that was only an incident and only temporary. The war did not permanently paralyze other lines of business, the value of exports and imports increasing from $604,412,996 in 1865 to $3,055,115,138 in 1908, an increase since the war of over 400 per cent. During the war of 1812 American foreign shipping declined, but in less than fifteen years we were carrying over 90 per cent of our foreign commerce in American vessels.

In 1870, under Republican administration, the tonnage of our foreign trade had decreased to 1,448,846 tons, a decline of over 1,000,000 tons. In 1880 there was only 1,314,402 tons; in 1890, 928,062 tons. In 1900 our tonnage had decreased to 816,795 tons, and in 1908 the tonnage of registered vessels was only 930,413 tons, a falling off since 1861 of over 1,560,000 tons. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let us go back to 1861, when you took charge of the Government. In 1860 the value of the imports and exports carried in American ships amounted to $507,247,756, being 66 per cent of the total imports and exports. In 1861 American ships carried $381,516,788 in value of exports and imports. In 1870 the value of exports and imports carried in American bottoms had declined to $352,969,401. In 1880 the reduction continued, only $258,346,577 in value carried in American ships. In 1890 the value had decreased to $202,451,086, and in 1900 only $195,084,192 worth; and in 1908 there was carried in American vessels values of imports and exports amounting to $272,513,322, being less than 10 per cent of the total imports and exports, and showing a falling off since 1860 of $234,734,434, while foreign vessels carried $2,793,253,186 worth of exports and imports.

Thus you see that as the tariff went up the tonnage of American foreign marine declined. As the tariff rates increased, the values of the imports and exports carried in American ships decreased from over 65 per cent to less than 10 per cent.

There is something else that happened when the tariff was reduced. I want you protective standpatters to bear in mind that the only decade in the history of the Republic when the Nation's wealth increased 100 per cent was from 1850 to 1860, when the tariff had been reduced and the Democracy was in control. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In 1861 the Republican party secured control of the Government and, with the exception of eight years, have been in control ever since; while a short time afterwards the manufacturing industries secured control of the Republican party and, with no exception, have been in control ever since. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Republican policy is to grant privileges to special interests, and, by reason of these privileges, the rates of the tariff have been systematically increased until now these rates prohibit many articles from entering this country. These rates have increased from 50 to 100 per cent. This, too, in face of the fact that our domestic manufacturers are successfully competing with foreign manufacturers even in their own markets. Competition in any article on the tariff list is necessarily limited to American dealers and manufacturers, because European and Asiatic manufacturers can not afford to pay this tariff and then compete with American dealers under such conditions. Competition then being restricted to American dealers and manufacturers and vast numbers of articles being prohibited from entering our ports, we find that our exports largely exceed our imports.

In 1908, when the Republican party promised us a revision of the tariff that we never got, our exports exceeded our imports in value $666,431,554. In other words, during that year nearly $700,000,000 worth of cargoes were sent out of the United States more than entered the United States. A large part of these exports consisted of cotton, grain, and other raw materials of great size and bulk; so, for this reason, the cargoes of our exports was probably several times larger in bulk than the cargoes of our imports. It is manifest, then, that there must be great demand for vessels to carry this immense cargo across the sea. The reason for few American ships in this trade is thus explained: All things being equal, the shipper will naturally favor the vessel carrying the flag of his own country. The owner of a foreign vessel securing a cargo of imports for the United States knows that when he has unloaded his cargo at Boston or New York or New Orleans or any other port in the United States, that he will have no difficulty about securing a return cargo and thus make a reasonable profit on both trips because of the great volume of exports waiting for shipment. But when an American ship unloads its cargo in foreign ports the chance of obtaining a return cargo is much diminished by reason of prohibitory tariff rates which prevent many articles from entering the United States, and it frequently occurs that American ships failing to secure a return cargo come home in ballast and are thus forced to make one cargo stand the expense and profit of two trips.

Again, home industries have been so highly protected by tariff laws and returns upon money invested in tariff-swollen properties are so great and the percentage of gain is so large that American capital, in obedience to natural laws, has been diverted from shipping interests where the profit would be comparatively small, and has sought those channels of commercial activity where favored legislation insures a profit. In shipping upon the high seas competition is open to all.

A Republican Congress of protective standpatters can not by tariff legislation restrain or interfere with the argosies of other lands. You can not syndicate the eternal charters of nature, nor subsidize God's great highways of traffic. The patriotic capitalists who are so loudly clamoring for the Government to aid the shipping business are willing to take no chances themselves. They have put their money in protected industries, where by taxation of all the people they are insured a profit; and they now ask that the Government tax all the people to increase the profits of the shipping business.

The Republican party partly justifies this high tariff on the ground of protection to American labor. The unselfish, generous spirit which prompted these high priests of protection to increase the tariff on axes, hoes, plows, anvils, mowing machines, and the steel parts of other agricultural and mechanical implements must fill the workingman's heart with admiration and love as, wringing the sweat from his face, he pays two prices to the steel trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The working man who works ten days for the real value of a suit of clothes would be ungrateful to complain because he is forced to work six more days to pay a tariff to the woolen trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The farmer of the South must forever cherish in his heart of hearts the grateful remembrance of the tender solicitude of those who sectionally taxed over 12,000,000 southern farmers to enrich two barons of the cotton-bagging trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The great masses of the American people on the farm, at the workshop, in the factories—all who toil and make their bread by the sweat of their brows—would stand accused of ingratitude sharper than a serpent's tooth if their very souls did not melt in grateful recognition of that legislation which has not only raised the price of lumber, so that hundreds of American citizens are forever denied the ownership of their own homes, but has also so increased the cost of living and so raised the price of provisions that thousands of little children are going breakfastless to school and supperless to bed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Your generous devotion to American labor is fooling no one but yourselves. And it is equaled only by your patriotic declaration that we must place the flag on every ship if it costs countless millions of the people's money to do so.

I would like to see Old Glory floating at the masthead of every vessel which carries our foreign commerce; but because I am not willing to take millions of dollars of the people's money to place it there, I and those who think with me have been called by these merchant-marine magazines and newspapers and ship-subsidy articles "ignorant asses, unprincipled demagogues, mouthy blatherskites, ignorant boors, contemptible agitators, and paid emissaries of foreign influences." These commercial patriots, sailing under patriotic titles, denouncing honest men for refusing to give the people's money to a few shipowners, are very anxious to fly the American flag—but they must be well paid for doing so. Their patriotism is measured by dollars and cents.

You on the other side of this Chamber boast that by your tariff laws we are now paying the highest wages in the world. You tell us that cheap foreign labor has driven Americans from the sea, and therefore, by subsidies, you want those men whom you say are well paid, contented, and happy, to relinquish their jobs at home and go upon the sea and compete with the cheap labor of the world. If an American workingman is making $50 per month in the factory or the workshop, the $50 that he makes is added to the wealth of the Nation. If he takes the place of a man whose toil is worth but $20 per month, $30 every month he fills the $20 man's place is taken away from the wealth of the country.

American labor is not seeking employment upon the sea, and there is no good reason why it should. Our resources at home are by no means exhausted. There is plenty of room for Americans in America. The American working man will not go upon the sea; he does not want to go roaming all over the face of creation ill-fed, ill-lodged, and working for half wages. He wants to be at home where his toil can be added to the Nation's wealth. He wants to be at home where he can mingle with his friends, enjoy the companionship of his wife, and watch over his children, so that they may grow up into useful, God-fearing citizens. He has made his choice; he wants to stay at home, and he should be congratulated on the wisdom of his selection. Why should we pay subsidies to induce Americans to go upon the sea when the seafaring men of other countries are eager to work for the reduced wage?

The wages of American labor are higher than the wages of the labor of other countries; yet, by reason of tariff legislation, $1 in Europe will often buy as much as $2 over here. Also, our labor is the most efficient in the world. The skill of our workmen surpasses that of any other labor. The man of skill, the efficient man, at twice the wage, may often do three times the work of the man not fitted by lack of skill for such employment. Yet you wish our skilled labor to leave the factory and the workshop at home and go into the business of loading and unloading vessels in competition with the coolies of China and the cheap pauper labor of the world. The true friend of our workingmen does not wish to force them upon the sea, but looks forward to a policy where the fruits of their toil may be carried to the markets of the world at the lowest possible rate, so that the profits on cheap transportation may be put into making more machinery, enlarging plants, building new factories, and in countless other ways creating new and additional employment for our labor.

Wages upon the sea which an American would scorn are eagerly sought for by the seamen of the overcrowded countries of Europe and the Orient. Shall we tax our people to put them out of business when our people do not want to do this work themselves; and will not do this work unless you pay them much more than now satisfies this cheap labor? Is such policy dictated either by humanity or common sense? We are the great export country of the world. Therefore, let us carry our goods to our markets as cheaply as we can. If, according to your theory, by subsidies we raise wages and take employment from those who buy from us, we will, of course, have fewer markets in which to sell. When we take employment from the pauper labor of other countries, this labor will come in swarms to our own. And the very ships which are asking us to enrich them by these subsidies may have labor agents all over Southern Europe and Russia inducing thousands of the illiterate, the anarchistic, the pauper labor of those countries to come in swarms to the United States to swell the dividends of the owners of these subsidized vessels, not alone by their passage money but also for the purpose of placing them in the manufacturing industries of the United States in direct competition with American labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.] While the tariff-swollen manufacturing industries clamor so loudly for the protection of American labor, yet if these same industries can secure this pauper labor at a wage lower than our people can work for and live, their boasted love for the American working man, like Bob Acre's courage, will ooze from their finger tips, and American labor must either come down to the reduced wage or else seek other employment. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If anyone doubts this assertion, I will refer him to conditions in the States of Rhode Island and Pennsylvania, the most highly protected States in this Union, where I am reliably informed that in the cities of Providence and Pittsburg a large per cent of the labor of the manufacturing industries are foreigners, many of whom can neither read nor write nor speak the English language.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLLIER. While the prohibitive tariff has done more to increase the cost of living than all other causes combined, yet you tell us that the reason for the increased cost of the necessaries of life is due to the fact that so many people are leaving the farms and going into other business. The population of the country is increasing; the consumers of food products are increasing, while, on the other hand, the producers of these products are decreasing and going into other vocations of life. If this be true, if the farms are being abandoned, if labor is scarce in the fields of productiveness, why—by subsidies, according to your theory—why increase wages so that others will be induced to leave these same fields of productiveness and add themselves to the great mass of consumers, and by so doing still further decrease the productive wealth of the Republic?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. COLLIER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to state for the gentleman's information that the president of the Seamen's Union of America testified before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to-day that there was absolutely no difference between the wages paid seamen on American vessels and those paid seamen on foreign vessels.

Mr. COLLIER. I am obliged to the gentleman. Such has been my information. I do not care how much you subsidize these vessels, I do not believe that the American seamen will get any more wages. [Applause.]

The reduction of the tariff will restore our merchant marine, but the party of protection will never agree to this. Rather than yield the tremendous profits they now enjoy by tariff legislation, these protected industries, so loudly clamoring for a ship subsidy, would see our merchant marine at the bottom of the sea. Rather than surrender one tithe of the enormous sums wrung every year from the pockets of the great masses of the American consumers, these commercial patriots would furl Old Glory forever and continue to sail on, under the piratical flag of protection.

than which what is harder—make a Republican see through the smoke of tariff-swollen industries and over the ramparts of protection, the struggling, toiling millions of the American people, who, with despairing faces and outstretched hands, are vainly looking for relief from the party in power to-day. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, there can be no effective road improvement in many States of this Union without the aid of the General Government. There is nothing, moreover, that is so much needed to the development of these States and to the prosperity and happiness of their people as a good system of public roads. This is admitted on all hands, as it is also well recognized that there will have to be a cooperation of county, State, and Nation before the roads in our more sparsely settled States can be so built as to be of essential service to the people of those States.

These facts being admitted, it seems strange that it is so hard to arouse Congress to the necessity of taking some action toward helping the States and people to construct a comprehensive system of roads. I have heard but two objections urged. The first is the size of the appropriation it will require, and the second is that it infringes upon the rights of the individual States.

I desire in this connection to have read a bill which I have introduced providing for an appropriation for this purpose and against which neither of the objections above referred to can be applied:

A bill (H. R. 5159) to distribute the surplus in the Treasury of the United States to the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia for the sole purpose of improving the roads therein.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury at the end of each fiscal year to take an account of all the funds in the Treasury of the United States, and after deducting from said sum the amounts required by law to be kept in said Treasury the remainder, if any, shall be declared a surplus.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to immediately provide for the distribution of said surplus, not exceeding $25,000,000 annually during the continuance of this law, on a per capita basis to the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, to be computed from the last general census taken by the national authorities, and shall prorate the same accordingly for the sole purpose of improving the postal roads in said States, Territories, and District of Columbia, under such rules and regulations as the States, Territories, and District of Columbia may provide, and said Secretary shall immediately notify the governors of said States and Territories and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the amounts due each, and that the same will be paid over to such person or persons as may be duly authorized by said States, Territories, and the District of Columbia to receive and receipt for the same.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the governors of the several States and Territories and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make a full and complete report to the Secretary of the Treasury on the 15th day of November of each year what legislation, rules, and regulations have been adopted for the expenditure of said funds upon the postal roads, the manner in which the same has been spent, and the results accomplished. And it shall be the duty of the said Secretary to submit said reports to Congress on the first day of each regular session.

This bill provides for an appropriation of $25,000,000 a year. Surely to a legislative body which is appropriating a billion dollars a year an appropriation of the size carried by this bill could not be thought to be extravagant when it goes to the accomplishment of improvements which will benefit directly and indirectly nine-tenths of the people of the American Republic.

Nor is this bill subject to the objection that it is conferring upon the National Government duties and functions which should be performed by the state governments. It provides simply that the National Government shall aid the States, Territories, and District of Columbia in doing a work of great public interest which the revenues of the States and Territories do not enable them to do properly. The National Government will have no discretion as to the method of expending this appropriation, except to see that it is not diverted or wasted. This bill provides that the appropriation shall be distributed among the States according to population, to be paid over to such persons as may be authorized by said States, and expended under the rules, laws, and regulations of those States and by the officers of those States. Surely the most punctilious States' rights man could not object to a measure of this character.

Under this bill Virginia would get, approximately, $608,546, and every other State, Territory, and the District of Columbia would get the part its population bears to the whole population of the country by the census of 1900.

Under this bill the counties in my congressional district would get the following sums:

Alleghany	$5,357
Amherst	5,836
Appomattox	3,147
Augusta	12,985
Bath	1,904
Botetourt	5,609
Buckingham	4,985
Craig	1,377
Cumberland	2,952
Fluvanna	2,952
Highland	1,835
Nelson	5,248
Rockbridge	7,905

A decided impetus has been given in the State of Virginia in the past year or two to the improvement of her public roads. The State and counties combined will spend during the coming year nearly a million dollars. This bill will add $608,546 to this amount, without any effect upon the revenues of the National Government and without any effect upon the Government itself, except to make Congress a little more economical in the expenditure of the public revenues in other directions.

Furthermore, the provisions of this bill are such as to exempt it, as I have shown, from the imputation of centralization by leaving the disbursement of the appropriation to the discretion of the States and Territories. And it also guards against malfeasance and extravagance by requiring that the annual expenditures shall be submitted to the rigid scrutiny of Congress.

With the aid of the Federal Government, and the amounts that are now being spent by state and local governments, good roads can be secured in a few years. I desire here to incorporate in my remarks the address of Mr. W. R. Golt, president of the Oklahoma Good Roads Association, which is one of the best addresses on this subject I have ever read, and demonstrates that with aid coming from the three sources I have indicated, a good system of public highways is within the reach of the people of this country:

ROAD CONSTRUCTION AND DRAINAGE.[a]

To undertake to locate, drain, and construct a railroad, to build a bridge, or a building without plans, would be disastrous, financially and otherwise, and subject one to just criticism, which applies with equal emphasis to road location, drainage, and construction.

Skilled location of a road accurately determines route, drainage, and grades, and skilled supervision and construction intelligently and economically executes the plans of the engineer, and conserves the moneys, resulting in enduring, permanent work at minimum cost.

The use of any material for bridges, culverts, or surfacing of a road that will not resist the elements, and sustain the wear of travel, is reprehensible indeed; such makeshifts should not be countenanced or permitted if permanent construction be intended or desired.

Build for all time, and 'tis cheap at any cost; and where the moneys are derived from the voting of bonds, posterity has every right to expect that there will be something left for them that will at least endure until the bonds mature; but temporary construction and makeshifts, without adequate plans and estimates, will be forever calling for continuous expenditure for maintenance, and prove, as has been demonstrated in the past, "an expensive luxury to the taxpayer."

Education is the one great factor that makes the engineer a necessity in road location and construction. His training for the purpose qualifies him to obtain results; whereas one uneducated and untrained usually leaves us "in the mud."

[a] Paper read at the Tenth National Goods Roads Convention, Topeka, Kans., December 14 and 15, 1909.

A mixture of soil or dirt and water produces mud, the depth of consistency being determined by the quantity of water present. It is simply a question of cause and effect; remove and prevent the water from obtaining access to the soils, and subsequent evaporation and absorption will leave only dry soils or dirt remaining after a mud hole is drained. Such a simple remedy for the treatment of a mud hole surely can be applied by any ordinary mortal, though he be not educated or skilled in the work. Where is the mortal who is willing to admit he does not know enough to "run water downhill?" Strange as it may seem, there do be mortals who venture where "engineers" fear to tread, who do attempt to run water uphill—a most extravagant and expensive undertaking, never accomplished by the wisest road overseer who ever built a mud hole—and there do be many.

In the location of a road or highway, a survey of the route will locate the road so as to obtain the shortest distance between the two points to be connected. Do not deviate from a straight line between these two points, except where first cost would be greatly reduced by locating on a more circuitous route, either to avoid heavy cuts through hills or high embankments across valleys, or in case property through which the road would pass would be excessively damaged. The less mileage there is to maintain the less the cost of maintenance. The shorter the distance the less time it requires to cover the road between the two points. All of our railroads built in the years gone by are now making cut-offs to shorten distance, and are reducing grades by cutting through the hills and filling across the valleys to obtain approximate levels and enable them to draw the maximum tonnage with the minimum expenditure of power—an economical feature which also applies to wagon roads and could be profitably utilized in their location and construction. Locate the roads as direct as is practical and possible, and to reach points off and away from the direct line or route locate lateral or branch roads. Under no circumstances, when easy grades obtain, should the highway or thoroughfare deviate from a direct course from the point of departure to the objective point. The direct line or location that enables the engineer to eliminate grades and obtain required drainage is the most economical, even though first cost is greater, for the reason that it will require less power to move the tonnage that must pass over the roadway and less time to cover the decreased or shortened distance. The old adage, "time is money," aptly obtains when a circuitous, undrained, muddy road with steep grades is encountered, though the locator evidently was not cognizant of the fact.

After location is determined, grades and drainage follow, and both should receive careful attention and consideration at the hands of the engineer. First, the grade line must be established, to reduce the hills, and fill the valleys, and bring the roadway to a maximum uniform slope or grade, of easy ascent and descent; not too steep, so as to permit heavy loads to be hauled without overtaxing the team, and where long ascents obtain, rests or level sections should be introduced in the grade line at proper intervals, to enable the teams to obtain a breathing place and take the loads off the collars. This will materially increase the tonnage that can be drawn, and be a factor in determining the value of the road commercially, as the steep sections of the road limit the tonnage though the major portion of the road may be practically level. Hence the economy of keeping down steep grades by cutting the hills as far as practical, even at a greater initial cost. After locating route and establishing grade lines, the material necessary for construction of embankment should be borrowed in such manner as to leave perfect drainage in both ditches, and to permit free run-off of the storm water; for perfect drainage and proper diverting of storm waters are the basic principles in the construction and maintenance of good roads.

The question of proper and perfect drainage is an essential feature, and is the principal factor in determining the cost of road maintenance. Avoid concentration of storm water, and do not attempt to carry it long distances in the upper ditch to save the cost of an additional culvert. Dispose of it at the first opportunity, and it will cease to add to the problems that confront us in road construction. When an embankment across a waterway imposes as a dam, and obstructs the free run-off of the storm water, provide a culvert under and across the roadway of adequate size to accommodate the storm water from each drainage area centering at each waterway, thus effectually draining the subbase of the embankment so as to give it a dry footing. Keep the subbase drained and dry and it will reduce the cost of maintenance to a minimum. The one enemy of good roads that must be continually combated is water. Unmolested, it will undermine and wash away the most expensive and carefully constructed roadway, and if permitted to stand in ditches on the upper side of the roadway it will seep through the subbase and destroy the embankment. Thorough and perfect drainage secures a dry, permanent subbase, without which a good road can not be maintained with any reasonable cost. Build from the subbase up. Expensive surfacing of roads with macadam, asphalt, oil, or any other approved material, can not stand under travel without a dry, well-drained subbase, which is the foundation of all permanent road construction, and must obtain.

Storm water conducted long distances in a ditch is constantly augmented by run-off from intersected water courses, and is ultimately concentrated and becomes difficult to handle; whereas if disposed of at frequent intervals, when the volume is limited, and conducted under and across the roadway into the lower ditch or spillway by small, permanent culverts constructed of vitrified culvert pipe, stone masonry, or cement concrete, the concentration of the storm water does not result, and its disposal is easily and economically accomplished and the subbase kept drained and dry. Assist the storm water in following its natural course from each drainage area. Simulate natural conditions, and provide an adequate culvert of sufficient port or capacity to accommodate the storm water that concentrates at each identical waterway obstructed by the embankment. The drainage should then be perfect, provided the lower ditch or spillway is constructed to accommodate the run-off. Fall is the factor that determines the velocity of the water and the carrying capacity of a flow line. Without fall there would not be any run-off to the storm water. Water is acted upon by the same general law that governs solids, and falls precisely as fast. Release a drop of water at a given point, permitting it to fall in space, and at the expiration of one-fourth of a second it will have reached approximately 1 foot from the initial point of release; whereas at the expiration of one-half second it will have reached 4 feet from the initial point of release, falling only 1 foot in the first quarter of a second, and with constantly increasing velocity, is finally falling with a velocity of 3 feet in a quarter of a second, virtually moving through three times the space in the last interval of time, which accelerated velocity is due to gravity. This establishes the axiom: "Fall is the factor that handles water." Conserve it, and utilize it, and you will find it a valuable assistant, as it will decrease the cost of culverts and drainage. Increasing the area of the cross section of a culvert is only obtained at an additional cost, and is neither advantageous or economical. Carefully compiled tables can be obtained from various sources giving the exact capacity in gallons per minute of any size culvert pipe on stated fall per hundred feet. A study of these tables will convince the most skeptical that the capacity of a culvert is determined by the velocity or momentum of the water, rather than by the area of the cross section.

The velocity of water flowing on a fall of 36 inches to the hundred feet is approximately 22 miles per hour, while the velocity of water flowing on a fall of 1 inch to the hundred feet is only approximately 4 miles per hour.

In the construction of culverts, vitrified culvert pipe will prove to be the most convenient, durable, and economical whenever it can be used to accommodate the volume of storm water or run-off. Purged by the fires of the kilns of all that is volatile, and fused together by the intense heat to which it is subject, it is the density of glass, and has all the strength of steel, resisting the action of the elements, and enduring until the end of time. In the construction of culverts where one line of vitrified culvert pipe will not accommodate the run-off, two or more lines can be laid, so as to secure enough port of capacity to care for the storm water originating on the watershed. Care should be taken to utilize all the available fall, that the velocity may be secured to assist in handling the run-off. When the ground is level and the fall is slight, only a shallow ditch should be excavated on the upper side of the roadway or embankment, excavating the majority of the grading material from the lower ditch, which construction will increase or converse the existing fall, elevating the upper end of the culvert so as to obtain the greatest fall across the roadway. When two or more lines of pipe are required to secure enough capacity to accommodate the run-off, the best results are obtained by separating the lines of pipe when placed in the embankment, allowing a space of 4 or 5 feet between them, which will prevent them from being obstructed by floating debris. When the embankment will not permit the use of a large-size pipe, because sufficient cover can not be secured to protect it from travel, the same capacity can always be obtained with two or more pipes of equal area if the same fall be maintained through the embankment from upper to lower ditch.

Example: If only 12 inches of cover could be secured when using a 24-inch vitrified culvert pipe, a cover of 18 inches can be obtained by using two 18-inch pipes, as there is 6 inches less diameter. The area of a 24-inch pipe is 452 square inches, whereas the area of an 18-inch pipe is 254 square inches. The capacity of the two 18-inch pipes on any stated fall is approximately the same as the capacity of one 24-inch pipe on the identical fall. If the road builder desires to increase the run-off or capacity of the culvert, and can secure adequate cover, he can obtain 6 inches more fall or gradient across the roadway by the use of two 18-inch pipes rather than one 24-inch pipe, for the reason that the upper end of the 18-inch pipe can be elevated 6 inches above the flow line of the 24-inch pipe, and still secure the same cover. This will materially increase the velocity and consequent run-off and decrease the cost of handling the storm water. Do not forget that fall has a value, if utilized, that can be computed in dollars and cents; remember that increasing the velocity increases the capacity, and thereby decreases the size of the pipe required to handle a stated quantity of run-off or storm water.

Example: A 24-inch pipe on a fall of 1 inch to the 100 feet has a carrying capacity of 2,396 gallons per minute. Increase the fall to 36 inches to the 100 feet, and it will have a carrying capacity of 14,466 gallons per minute, which is over six times the capacity it had on 1 inch of fall. Under these conditions, if the fall can be obtained, the road builder could use one pipe in lieu of six at one-sixth the expense, which is evidence that fall has a money value, and is an economic factor in road construction. Nature bestows it lavishly at times, and again almost withholds it. If you will conserve and utilize it you will not find it so expensive to handle the storm water. We refer to vitrified culvert pipe particularly, for the reason that an established gradient can always be maintained and a fixed velocity secured whereby the capacity can always be accurately determined. When any other approved material is used in culvert construction, it is still imperative that fall receive due consideration to economically handle the run-off or storm water.

Substantial abutments of brick or stone masonry, or cement concrete, should be constructed at each end of the culvert when either vitrified pipe or other approved material is used for culvert construction.

On level bottom lands no excavation should be permitted to form a ditch on the upper side of the grade on embankment, as it will only provide a place for water to accumulate and stand, constantly seeping into and through the subbase. The better construction on such lands is to borrow all the material for the embankment from the lower ditch and wherever water is concentrated in depressions on the upper side of the embankment, provide and construct a culvert to secure a run-off into the lower ditch. If the embankment is high enough to insure a dry surface court of 18 inches to 24 inches and the run-off of the lower ditch secures sufficient drainage to keep it dry, a good road can be easily maintained.

In the construction of all grades longitudinal or lengthwise drainage must be maintained, so as to permit of run-off from the numerous ruts that occur at some seasons on steep grades or hillsides. "Thank-you-marms" or V-shaped obstructions should be constructed across the roadway at frequent intervals with the apex uphill to divert the water from the ruts to the ditches. On steep ascents no water should be permitted to pass over the embankment. The roadway should slope toward the hill and shed the water into the upper ditch, from which it should be permitted free exit through culverts under and through the embankment, to secure free run-off and prevent concentration and consequent erosion or washing out of upper ditch. This is usually secured by an obstruction in the form of a dam across the ditch immediately below the run-off culvert.

The embankment or grade should be constructed to secure free run-off of storm water and should consist of a berm on either side of the roadway proper to support and sustain the spread of the roadway under travel.

Subdrainage should be appealed to where it becomes necessary to intercept a seep, or drain the subbase, by lowering the water levels. Common porous drain tile is used exclusively for this purpose by engineers; the tile being laid in such manner as to drain into the lower ditch, where the end should be protected by an abutment.

Absolutely level gradients should never obtain in the construction of embankment on approximately level ground, but slight grades should be secured longitudinally to accelerate and secure run-off from the ruts produced by travel. This can always be accomplished by raising the grade of the embankment gradually from each side when a culvert is constructed, so that the culvert will be at the apex or summit of the grades.

This will prevent any holes and insure drainage of the surface of the roadway. Subsoils should be used in the construction of embankment and when complete the slopes and surface should receive a cover of the surface soils to encourage the growth of grass and prevent erosion of the surface by rut or the run-off of the storm water.

Light wash soil on dirt that is deposited in the draws or depression should never be used to construct an embankment. The usual method of construction of embankments by throwing all the grass, sod, and humus to the center of the roadway, where it becomes a storage for all the moisture it will retain, should be discountenanced.

The relation of drainage to good road construction is so important that every little detail must be provided for to insure the stability and permanency of the construction of good roads. The skill of the most expert engineer is often taxed, and various experiments must be made before success is achieved and the work secured from damage or injury for want of proper drainage. Therefore the employment of the unskilled, uneducated, and inexperienced should be discountenanced, and those placed in charge who are educated for the work.

Drainage is all there is to road building. This accomplished, and you have a good, dry road. What more could you ask for? Macadam! Eh? This is only a question of what your pocketbooks will stand for, but without drainage, macadam would be an extravagant waste of money, and ineffectual.

On the road to the creaking water mill,
Halting, the mud-burdened horses stand still;
In torrents and gusts pours the pitiless rain
On the roadway the builder neglected to drain.
The driver said: "If I had a boat,
I could cross this flood,
But a wagon won't float."

Some question has been raised as to the constitutionality of the Federal Government aiding in the construction of our highways. I think undoubtedly the power of the Government to make appropriations for this purpose is ample and can be defended.

The power is expressly given to Congress by the Constitution "to provide for the general welfare," and the general welfare of this country demands at this time nothing so imperatively as it does a good system of public roads—a thing which we can never have without the aid of the Federal Government.

The exercise of this power to aid in the building of public highways is more than one hundred years old. As far back as Jefferson's first administration Congress made provision for a national road from Georgia to New Orleans, which was completed during Jefferson's last term, and of which there is a map in the Library of Congress.

In 1816 Henry Clay made a speech in advocacy of the construction by the General Government of an extensive system of turnpikes and canals. He was ably seconded by John C. Calhoun.

At the next session of Congress, in 1817, Calhoun took the lead in advocating a bill to set apart and pledge the bonus of the national bank and the shares of the United States as a permanent fund for constructing roads and canals and improving the navigation of water courses.

In 1818 Clay made another speech on the subject of internal improvement, in which, after an elaborate argument upon the constitutionality of the subject, he discusses the great benefit of canals and turnpikes to the country. His remarks would apply to turnpikes at the present time. He said:

I think it very possible that the capitalist who should invest his money in one of these objects might not be reimbursed 3 per cent annually upon it, and yet society in various forms might actually reap 15 or 20 per cent.

And again he said:

Of all the modes in which a government can spend its surplus revenue none is more permanently beneficial than that of internal improvement. Fixed to the soil, it becomes a durable part of the land, itself diffusing comfort and activity and animation on all sides.

Mr. Clay was an untiring and strenuous advocate of the Cumberland road—the great national pike to extend from Cumberland, Md., to St. Louis. The bill for the first section of this road passed Congress March 29, 1806, which authorized the President [Mr. Jefferson] to appoint three commissioners to lay out the road from Cumberland to the Ohio River. This road had many ups and downs during successive administrations, but by the time railroads began to loom up it had been completed to Vandalia, Ill., at an expense to the Government of nearly $7,000,000, a sum which meant then many times to the Government what that amount would mean now.

In the Eighteenth Congress Thomas H. Benton fathered the bill to lay out a road from the border of Missouri to the boundary line of the United States, and thence, with the consent of Mexico, to the frontier of New Mexico. In his Thirty Years in the Senate he attributed the waning interest in the subject to the application of steam to boats and railway trains. He uses the following language:

The progress of events has withdrawn the whole subject—the subject of a system of national internal improvements once so formidable and engrossing the public mind—from the halls of Congress and discussion of the people. Steamboats and steam cars have superseded turnpikes and canals.

Even the great works accomplished by Congress at vast cost, after long and bitter debates, and deemed national at the time, have lost their character and sunk into the class of common roads. The Cumberland road, which cost $6,700,000, was a prominent subject in Congress for thirty-four years, from 1802, when it was conceived, to 1836, when it was abandoned to the States. This road, once so absorbing the public money and public attention, has degenerated into a public highway and is entirely superseded by the parallel railway.

There is no real distinction between a turnpike and a railroad in their claims for help from the General Government. But the railroads have been aided to the extent of millions and millions of dollars in land and money by the National Government, while the proposition to secure aid for the highways of the country meets with no favor beyond a respectful hearing.

There is no real distinction, so far as the public good and welfare is concerned, between the aiding of public roads and the aiding of waterways, and yet our waterways and harbors have been aided to so colossal an extent as to dwarf and finally eclipse our equally valuable highways.

The importance of good roads is so apparent it will not be questioned by one and need not be discussed.

We are approaching this year hundreds of millions for rivers and harbors, for our naval establishment, and for the army.

The building of a comprehensive system of good roads is of more importance to the people of this country than any one or all of these purposes.

The necessity for better roads in many parts of this country is the greatest need of the hour. The States and counties can not build them. The right kind of roads can only be built, and will only be built, when the National Government lends a helping hand. If we are ever to have a system of roads in this country to compare with those of the other enlightened nations of the world, it must be done by the aid of the Federal Government. If the agricultural communities of this country are ever to be thoroughly developed and made desirable as places of abode during all seasons of the year, it can only be done when the Federal Government has determined to aid in the construction of proper highways and turnpikes.

The cost of transportation is the vital question in all modern commerce. With the world's markets in which to dispose of our products, our success and prosperity is largely dependent on costs of carrying our products to these markets. * * * The cost of carrying a ton 100 miles in England is $2.35; in Germany $2.25; in France $2; in the United States 72 cents, the cheapest freight rates in the civilized world, and we have very properly regulated them. On the other hand, the cost of moving our products from the farms to the railroad stations is from two to four times as much as it is in France or Germany. This part of the cost of transportation to the markets of the world is just as vital to our success and the development of our foreign trade as is the railroad freight.

A circular of the Agricultural Department states that, on an average, it costs 25 cents per ton per mile for hauling farm products over common earth roads.

All the progressive nations of Europe are giving national aid to their highways, while our Government is following the example of the South American nations, thereby imposing a burden of millions of dollars annually upon our producers; and a glance at the condition of the South American countries ought to convince us of the error of our ways. That land, so prodigal in its resources, is still more affluent in the number and availability of its waterways, and yet Brazil, Argentina, and Peru have burdened themselves with railroads, which have weighted them down, while their domestic commerce is largely transported upon the pack saddle.

What a different picture has been presented by the countries of Europe. A splendid system of roads has been inaugurated by those countries. The great Napoleon, following the example set by the Roman Empire, built an extensive system of roads throughout France, and now not less than $7,000,000 each year is expended by the French Government in keeping up these roads and making new roads. This work employs 35,000 people, and they now have 350,000 miles of well-paved roads.

The central Government of England began to improve the roads in that country in 1835, and now $15,000,000 is being expended yearly upon their roads. Macaulay, in writing of the condition of the public roads in England prior to 1835, gives a description of them that is applicable to our roads seventy-five years later. He says:

The fruits of the earth were sometimes suffered to rot in one place, while a few miles distant the supply fell short of the demand. One general cause of the badness of the roads was the defective state of the law. Every parish was bound to repair the roads which passed through it, and thus a sparse and impoverished parish was often compelled to maintain highways between rich and populous towns.

The farming element of the country constitutes about 35 per cent of its population, and it is not fair or equitable to expect it unaided to build and maintain the public highways of the country. It creates the wealth of the Nation, which largely finds its way into the pockets of other people, and yet has been required unaided to maintain the highways of the Nation. It has produced an amount of wealth within the past ten years equal to one-half of the entire national wealth, and, though but little more than one-third of the population, it has contributed more than two-thirds of the amount needed to support the Government, and yet its just demands for aid in building a good system of thoroughfares go unheeded.

Let the farmer withhold his hand from the plow for two seasons and the grass will grow in your thoroughfares, barnacles and bilge water will rot your ships as they lie idle at your docks, cobwebs will festoon your countinghouses, owls and bats will usurp your warehouses, your children will clamor to you for bread, and we will gather in this Chamber with pallor in our faces.

Who, sir, are the most trustworthy guardians of the Republic? Why, sir, those whose activities cluster around the home, whose virtues are those of the family, and whose patriotism springs from and is fostered by the roof tree. Such men are not blown about by every wind of doctrine, but are the ultimate and supreme hope for the conservation of our institutions.

It is but just that a class of our population which furnished so much of the greatness of the Nation and to the support of the Government, and hitherto has gotten so little from the National Government, should receive all the aid that can be given to it constitutionally.

While the country has advanced in area, in population, and in wealth, and along all lines of science, trade, and industry, no advancement has been made in the condition of our roads in many sections of the country during the past one hundred years.

The statement of the average cost of transportation from the farm to the railroad station, to which I referred a few minutes ago, demonstrates what an immense financial advantage a good system of roads would be to the farmers of this country. And of vital and pressing moment to the national welfare is the fact that a good system of roads would check the tendency of the people to leave the farm and go to the city. This drift has taken from the farm much of the bone and sinew essential to a successful carrying on of our agriculture. It is producing an unhealthy congestion in large centers of population. The problem of getting young men to go back to the country from the cities and those already there to remain in the country is growing graver every day. The State and Nation alike have been wisely contributing to the advantages of the country as a place of residence. A more extensive system of schools is being inaugurated each year. I know this to be true in my own State, and I believe it is true of every other State in the Union. Circulating libraries are doing much to add to the comfort of country life, and the rural free delivery of mails makes a great and permanent inducement to such a life. How these advantages would be enhanced by a system of good roads every intelligent man can see. Every mile of turnpike would secure to the farmers on both sides what political economists call the "unearned increment," just as the proximity to the railroad or the church or the schoolhouse does, and with the main permanent thoroughfares in good condition more time and heart would be given to the farmer to improve the plantation road.

The wear and tear of his team, which is his capital, would be greatly lessened. The increase in value of his land would be greatly increased. The development of a neighborhood with such thoroughfares would proceed in geometrical ratio.

With the agricultural interests of the land upon a satisfactory basis we have the real breakwater to financial disaster, for all real value is in the land. With the earth yielding her increase, the fluctuations upon the stock market are of no vital moment. The exploitation of railroads, the watering of stock, the artificial showings, the manipulation and even wreckage of railroads are not disasters save to the gamblers, for the railroads never cease to haul the produce to the markets.

Our great cities are augmenting their population in an accelerated ratio. Some day without warning they may tell a tale of disaster, and then there will be no escape or refuge save in the immunity, the stability, and the conservation of the country.

Let the General Government foster this great enterprise, not only at the behest of justice, but of wisdom, for whatever confirms and strengthens the agricultural interests performs the same for every other interest. Upon the strength and security of the farmer rests the integrity and security of the Nation.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, as we are in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having under consideration the Post-Office appropriation bill, I will endeavor, so far as possible, to confine my remarks to the features bearing upon the questions at issue; but regret that the limit on my time will not permit of my dealing at length upon the many questions of momentous importance to the people which are incorporated in the bill. I am glad to know that our efforts to prevent the increase of postage on second-class mail matter have succeeded, as I looked upon the measure as an attempt to put a tax on knowledge, and as an embargo upon the dissemination of intelligence, and if an effort is made to so amend this bill as to increase the postage on newspapers and periodicals, I wish now to enter my most vigorous protest.

RURAL FREE-DELIVERY ROUTES.

While a small amount is carried in this bill for the purpose of extending rural free-delivery routes, it is nothing like adequate to supply the demands of the people. Under the pretext of economizing, it is not right to begin on those measures which are so vital to the welfare of the great mass of the people. I recognize the fact that in many sections of the country the people are supplied with adequate mail facilities and that there are vast areas of country where adequate Rural Free Delivery Service prevails. In other sections the service is entirely inadequate to supply the wants of the people.

For four years I have worked to have this service extended in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent, and I have no complaint to make against the department officials for not granting the requests which have been made for the further extension of these routes, for their official report shows that the funds for the purpose were not available, and their good faith has been shown by the fact that favorable reports have been sent in in favor of the establishment of a number of these routes in the Fourth Congressional District of Louisiana, which could not be established for the want of funds.

GOOD ROADS.

One of the obstacles in the way of the establishment of rural free-delivery routes is bad roads, and in Louisiana, until recently, there had been no concentrated effort to establish good roads throughout the State; but recently a movement has been inaugurated by the governor to construct good roads, and the state convicts furnished for the purpose of building good roads, and an active interest is being taken throughout the entire State in the construction of good roads, and to-day the roads are in such shape as to justify the establishment of many new routes. Good roads are conducive to the welfare and the happiness of the people, and I have never missed an opportunity to work and speak in favor of them. The desire for the establishment of rural free-delivery routes arouses an interest in good roads. When these routes are established, the reports of the Weather Bureau can be sent over them and the people can be kept advised daily as to the condition and changes in the weather. They keep in touch with the outside world and do not have to go to the expense and lose the time required to leave their work and go for miles to the post-office.

PARCELS POST.

It has been recommended by the Postmaster-General that a system of parcels post be established over the rural free-delivery routes. He suggested that the parcels be delivered to the carrier at the initial point, or at any intermediate point on the rural free-delivery route, and be carried at a greatly reduced rate of postage. This plan will not only overcome the objection which some of the local merchants have had to the rural routes, but will greatly benefit both the merchant and the farmer, and at the same time put the rural routes on a paying basis.

My time being limited to fifteen minutes, I can not state the many other advantages of the rural free-delivery routes; but I trust that when an effort is made to increase the appropriation for the purpose of extending these routes it will not be opposed by those who already have adequate service, for this question is next in importance to the agriculturists to that of suppressing the gambling in agricultural products, for which we have been laboring.

BOLL WEEVIL.

I do not intend, by this statement, to minimize the effects of the ravages of the cotton boll weevil in the South, for the extermination of which I have worked for the last four years, and for which purpose I spoke a few days ago in this House; but if the farmers of the South build good roads, and through them get rural free-delivery routes, they can the better handle the boll-weevil situation. With bad roads they can not haul perishable farm products to market, and without the stimulus to build good roads, which the hope of getting rural free-delivery routes gives them, they are not so apt to have their roads in condition so as to enable them to resort to the diversification of their crops when the boll weevil reaches their section of country.

PAY OF MAIL CARRIERS.

If the appropriation for the extension of these rural free-delivery routes is not increased, I fear that there will be an effort to carry into execution the suggestion which has been made to cut down the salaries of the rural free-delivery carriers, as the pressure will be so great to have new routes established that the salaries of the carriers will have to be reduced to provide funds for the extension of the service. It will be wrong to reduce the salaries of the rural carriers. By the time they buy their teams and conveyances and pay for their maintenance there is no profit left for them; if they get a meager support out of it they must resort to the most rigid economy. This is clearly shown by the reports which I have from the carriers in my congressional district, which, by permission, I will append to my statement and extend it in the RECORD.

We all understand, Mr. Chairman, that the legislation of this body is done by the committees of the House, and that after a committee has made its report it is difficult to procure an amendment to it. Having this in view, I requested a hearing before the committee, besides filing a bill to have the salaries of the rural free-delivery carriers increased, which was filed anticipating an opportunity of fully presenting my views upon all the questions to which I have hastily referred.

ECONOMY.

While expressing my desire for increased appropriations for the objects referred to, I have been chided for my efforts to economize in other matters. While a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs I opposed the construction of four battle ships each year, as that would incur an enormous expense for visionary purposes; but for every dollar spent in the development of the country and adding to the prosperity of the people, we are simply returning to those who contribute to support the Government what is justly due to them. We all recognize that agriculture is the mainstay, the foundation, the support of all other occupations and that it receives a mere pittance in return from the Government, while nearly 70 per cent of the revenues of the Government is spent in matters pertaining to warfare in a time of profound peace. I also thought that it was the proper time to economize when there was an effort to increase the salaries of the President, Vice-President, the Speaker of the House, and the Members of the House of Representatives, and I have voted against all these measures, as I believe that the effort to economize should be made where it could be easiest borne, and I did not believe that it was right to increase the salaries of those who could afford to do without the increased pay; besides it bordered somewhat on a question of morals, and I have made it a rule to support every proposition which tended toward the moral uplift of the people, as was the case when the law was passed to prevent the Members of Congress and other officials riding on railroad passes, and when the law was passed at this session of Congress to put a stop to the nefarious practice of transporting women for immoral purposes, either from State to State or from another country to this country. While I have alluded to the fact that rural free-delivery routes have been generally established in some sections of the country, while there are localities in the South where very few of them have been established, I trust that the idea that there is any sectionalism involved in the question at issue will not be conveyed, for I believe that it is due to the conditions and not on account of the locality.

POLITICS.

I hoped that neither politics nor sectionalism would be injected into this discussion; but it has been stated that if the tariff bill of last year had been so framed as to have reduced the rates on all commodities the competition would have been greater, more foreign goods would have come into our country, and we would have derived a sufficient revenue from the imports at the reduced rate to have run the Government without having to face a hundred-million-dollar deficit and be pleading for economy in those lines of government business which are so vital to the welfare of the people.

It is difficult to understand how a difference can be made in legislative matters based on sectional lines, for the South is just as much a part of this great country as the North or the East, and still when the tariff bill was made those sections of the country were protected to the exclusion of the South.

THE TARIFF ON LUMBER.

While the Republican party stands for a high protective tariff, the members of that party voted to take the protective duty of $2 per thousand off of rough lumber and placed the tariff of $1.25 per thousand on it. The lumber industry had shifted from the North to the South, and some of the wealthy lumbermen of the North had gone into Canada and were engaged in the lumber business there.

The only article in the entire tariff bill on which I voted to place a tariff duty was on lumber. The tariff on rough lumber was at that time $2 per thousand. I voted to cut this rate one-half and put the tariff duty on rough lumber at $1 per thousand. This was one of the first items in the tariff bill which was reached, and if the tariff on all of the other items could have been cut one-half, we would have something like a Democratic tariff bill for revenue. Forty-seven Democrats in the House of Representatives voted as I did on this item in the tariff bill. When the bill went to the Senate the rate on rough lumber was raised from $1 a thousand, at which price it had been fixed in the House of Representatives, to $1.50 per thousand. This was an increase in the tariff of 50 per cent.

On this proposition to increase the rate from $1 to $1.50 per thousand 27 Democratic Senators voted. Of these 27 Democratic Senators 17 voted for the tariff rate on lumber to be fixed at $1.50 per thousand, while 10 Democratic Senators voted against it. It was not treated as a party measure at all. These Senators, many of whom are veterans of the civil war and have been true and tried Democrats all of their lives, fully understood that they were not voting for a measure for the protection of the lumber interests, but for a revenue interest in conformity with the requirements of the Democratic party. In conference the tariff on rough lumber was finally fixed at $1.25 per thousand, which is 25 cents a thousand less than a majority of the Democratic Senators voted for, and 25 cents a thousand more than I voted for.

When our "Peerless Leader," W. J. Bryan, was a Member of Congress he would not accept a tariff of 20 cents or of 22 cents on barley, but contended for 25 cents, because his people wanted barley protected; but when some of the lumber people wanted me to vote for $2 a thousand on lumber I declined to do so, because I thought that rate might be slightly protective and not in harmony with the Democratic policy of a tariff for revenue.

The government statistics clearly show that a tariff duty of $1 a thousand is not a protective duty on lumber, as it costs the lumbermen of the United States more to get their lumber into competing lumber markets than it costs their competitors, the Canadians.

If the Democrats had won the last election there would have been a chance to put lumber on the free list; because the Democratic majority then could have framed the tariff bill on a basis of equalizing duties, as well as harmonizing the western Democrats, whom it would have taken to give this majority.

But the people of the West did not accept the proffer of free lumber which was made to them, and there was a Republican majority, which meant a protective tariff bill as a whole. There was a revenue of $4,000,000 to be derived from the tariff on lumber. A $1 tariff would not prevent the Canadians from bringing their lumber to America, because their freight would not be half what it costs the American to have his lumber delivered into the same market. Therefore the tariff of $1 a thousand is not a protective tariff, but a tariff which will produce us millions of dollars a year in revenue without costing our people anything.

If we had dispensed with this revenue derived from the tariff on lumber, it would have been necessary to have made up the deficiency by increasing the tariff on shoes, clothing, or in some other way, as it was necessary to raise $400,000,000 to run the Government whether the Democrats or the Republicans were in power. Regardless of which party is in power there has to be a tariff to support the Government, and the Democratic party has uniformly recognized this necessity by framing a tariff bill when in the majority.

The $4,000,000 saved out of the tariff on lumber would go a long way toward supporting the rural free-delivery routes throughout the entire country.

When parties or individuals make pledges based on conditions and the conditions fail, and it becomes impossible to carry out the pledges, then it is safe to adopt measures of justice, right, and equality.

W. J. Bryan, who has three times been selected as the standard-bearer of the Democratic party, adopted this as his criterion when he was a Member of Congress, and voted against the repeal of the law which places a tax on the issue of state banks.

THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL PLATFORM.

The Democratic national platform had a plank in it demanding the repeal of this law. Mr. Bryan voted against its repeal after the platform was adopted. He had voted against the repeal of the law before the platform was adopted, and after the party platform was adopted he again spoke and voted against it, although the Democratic party won the election on that platform. He stated that prior to his nomination he had taken that position, and he stood by it. In other words, he did not consider that he was nominated on the Democratic platform like the President and Vice-President were, but as a Democrat to represent his congressional district.

Whether his position was correct or not, he has been greatly honored since then by the Democratic party.

PARTY MEASURES.

On all party measures I have voted with the Democratic party and have attended and been bound by every caucus which has been held since I have been a Member of Congress. If on this account I am not to be accorded privileges which are conceded to others who are not obedient to the behests of their party, then I am content to suffer in patience and bide my time until there is a change in the political complexion of this House. The day is coming in the near future when those Democrats who have been loyal will come into their own.

Mr. McKINLEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, to meet misrepresentations widely circulated, I desire to present some truth about the tariff and prices, giving a few facts and figures that may, perhaps, as a whole, be called a "congressional campaign spike."

First. What was the Republican pledge regarding the tariff revision?

Here is the plank adopted at the Chicago convention, June 18, 1908:

The Republican party declares unequivocally for the revision of the tariff by a special session of Congress immediately following the inauguration of the next President, and commends the steps already taken to this end in the work assigned to the appropriate committees of Congress which are now investigating the operation and effect of existing schedules. In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries. We favor the establishment of maximum and minimum rates, to be administered by the President under limitations fixed in the law, the maximum to be available to meet discriminations by foreign countries against American goods entering their markets, and the minimum to represent the normal measure of protection at home, the aim and purpose of the Republican policy being not only to preserve, without excessive duties, that security against foreign competition to which American manufacturers, farmers, and producers are entitled, but also to maintain the high standard of living of the wage-earners of this country, who are the most direct beneficiaries of the protective system. Between the United States and the Philippines we believe in a free interchange of products, with such limitations as to sugar and tobacco as will afford adequate protection to domestic interests.

As President Taft said at Winona:

I did not agree, nor did the Republican party agree, that we would reduce rates to such a point as to reduce prices by the introduction of foreign competition. That is what the free traders desire. That is what the revenue tariff reformers desire; but that is not what the Republican platform promised, and it is not what the Republican party wished to bring about. To repeat the statement with which I opened this speech, the proposition of the Republican party was to reduce rates so as to maintain a difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production here, insuring a reasonable profit to the manufacturer on all articles produced in this country; and the proposition to reduce rates and prevent their being excessive was to avoid the opportunity for monopoly and the suppression of competition, so that the excessive rates could be taken advantage of to force prices up.

WAS THE TARIFF REVISED?

Immediately after the convening of the second session of the Sixtieth Congress, following the election of 1908, the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, where all tariff bills must originate, began the preparation of a tariff law to carry out the pledge of the Republican platform. Hearings were held almost daily and thousands of pages of testimony were taken. On the invitation of the committee everyone in any way interested in the tariff question was invited to come to Washington and testify before the committee or to file a brief regarding their industry.

President Taft on March 6, 1909, two days after his inauguration, kept the pledge of the platform and called a special session to convene March 15 for the sole purpose of revising the tariff. On the second day of this extra session the President's first message was read in both Houses, and on the day following a tariff bill was presented. It was reported by the Ways and Means Committee on March 18. It passed that body on April 15, and was at once taken up by the Senate, where it was exhaustively debated and largely amended, going to conference, and becoming a law on August 6.

How prolonged and exhaustive was the debate is seen in the fact that 4,888 pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD were consumed by its consideration, as compared with 2,527 pages given to the debate on the Dingley bill.

As will be seen by Statement A, of 2,024 items of the Dingley law, 874 were changed, there being 654 decreases of duty and 220 increases. We are therefore justified in saying that the Republican pledge concerning the tariff was kept, that a special session was called, that an entirely new bill was framed, and that the schedules were very generally and substantially revised.

WAS THE TARIFF REVISED DOWNWARD?

The answer to this question can be found in statements A and B.

In the first place, as regards items changed, there were 654 decreases as compared with 220 increases—that certainly would show three times as much revision downward as revision upward, although for the purpose of deriving sufficient revenue and adequate protection 1,150 items were left unchanged, the majority believing that the old duties fully met all requirements—for example, only 33 of the 187 items in the agricultural schedule were changed. But referring to the table showing the consumption value of articles affected, it is found that duties were decreased upon articles having a consumption value in round numbers of $5,000,000,000 and increased upon articles having a consumption value of $878,000,000. But of those articles upon which the duties were increased, $638,000,000 in consumption value were luxuries, leaving some $240,000,000 only of increases on necessaries, or twenty times as much decrease as increase.

Total consumption value of articles on which rates of duty were decreased		$4,951,813,175
Total consumption value of articles on which rates of duty were increased	$878,756,074
Total consumption value of luxuries, articles of voluntary use, on which rates of duty were increased	637,903,549
Total consumption value of articles, not luxuries, on which rates of duty have been increased		240,852,525

These figures, then, answer the above question and show that there was a most substantial downward revision.

This conclusion, however, is made even more convincing by giving the following specific examples of actual reductions of duty on articles of common every-day use:

President Taft says:

I have signed the Payne tariff bill because I believe it to be the result of a sincere effort on the part of the Republican party to make a downward revision.

Congressman McCALL, who was the Massachusetts member of the conference committee on the Payne tariff bill, says:

It represents the greatest reduction that has been made in the tariff at any single time since our first revenue law was signed by George Washington.

Congressman BOUTELL, in a recent speech, said:

I close with a statement which everybody who has studied the Payne tariff knows is true. Every man in this body ought to know it. Investigation by a commission such as I have suggested, made up exclusively of Democrats from agricultural districts, would prove it, and it would be a unanimous report of all that investigated this subject of high prices: There is not in the Payne tariff law a single advance in rate above the Dingley rates that justifies an increase in the final retail price to the ultimate consumer of a single necessary article of food, of clothing, or of household use.

Governor Hughes, during the campaign, said:

Revision there must be. It should be prompt, thorough, and fair. But the policy of protection will be maintained and American industry, involving the interests of our wage-earners, must be properly safeguarded.

Now, a word about raw materials:

Under the new tariff bill hides have been placed on the free list. Timber has been reduced 50 per cent; lumber has been reduced from 20 to 50 per cent; bituminous coal has been reduced 33 per cent; iron ore has been reduced 62½ per cent; pig iron has been reduced 37½ per cent; scrap iron has been reduced 75 per cent; petroleum and all its products have been put on the free list.

WAS THE TARIFF REVISED WISELY AND SUCCESSFULLY?

President Taft and many others have asserted that the present tariff law is the best that we have ever had, and this statement seems to be fully substantiated by the results attained so far during its operation. In the first place, we find that from a revenue standpoint it has been unusually successful. The revenues have increased by some $45,000,000 since its enactment. The deficit for the entire fiscal year, if not wiped out entirely, will probably be but a few million dollars.

The new law had not been in operation many weeks before there was a most decided revival of business, and before the end of the year 1909 it was estimated that 3,000,000 idle men had found employment.

When the tariff was passed there were some 200,000 idle freight cars in the country; before the end of the year there were none. When the tariff was passed our consumption of pig iron was only about half that of the preceding year, but during the last six months of 1909 our consumption was larger than during any similar period in our history, and the record for the year, in spite of the poor business of the first six months, was greater than that of any previous year. In all avenues of industry there was not only almost record-breaking activity, but the prospects for more business grew brighter and brighter every week. The additional purchasing power, given to the people during the latter months of 1909, created a demand for our agricultural products to such an extent that their value is estimated at more than $9,000,000,000, or a billion dollars in excess of the record-breaking figures of the year before.

Weighing, then, the conditions which existed previous to the enactment of the tariff and those which have followed during its operation, it can not be questioned that the tariff was revised and that it was revised downward and that it was revised wisely and successfully.

HIGH PRICES.

In the midst of this prosperity and industrial progress which have come under the operation of the new tariff law we are confronted by perhaps higher prices in some commodities than we have ever known before in time of peace. We are told by certain Democrats and demagogues that these higher prices are due to the tariff. This assertion is made in the face of the fact that upon no article which has been increased in price was the tariff increased, but, on the contrary, in most of them there was a reduction of the duty. In this connection attention is called to the list of commodities in general use upon which the tariff was left unchanged or materially reduced. A single example or two will show the absurdity of those who contend that higher prices are due to the new tariff law. Not only was the duty on boots and shoes reduced from 25 per cent to 10 per cent ad valorem, a reduction of 60 per cent, but hides were made free, and yet to-day we are compelled to pay a higher price all over the country for our boots and shoes. An attempt has been made in certain quarters to increase the price of clothing, and yet there was no increase of duty. On woolens the duty was left unchanged, and on cotton goods the few increases were only upon the higher priced and luxurious grades. On almost all building material, whether of wood or iron and steel, the tariff was very substantially reduced. On agricultural implements and household utensils, and in fact all the necessaries of life, there was a substantial reduction, as can be proved by examining the various schedules of the new law.

Higher prices, therefore, on any commodity can not be attributed to the new tariff law, and those who raise the price and give the tariff as the reason are deceiving their customers by falsifying the facts.

One important cause for high prices is made clear by a recognized authority, as follows:

COST OF LIVING.

[From the Commercial American.]

The general high prices and increased cost of living continue to trouble our legislative bodies and bid fair almost to supply the place for discussion occupied a few years ago by railway rates. High as the present rates are, the conditions are by no means confined to America. Similar conditions are reported from Germany, Austria, England, and elsewhere. There is doubtless some connection in this country between our own high prices and the crop situation as regards export shipment, and the official reports on the subject are also considering the general advance in the standard of living.

GOLD PRODUCTION.

At the same time the figures for the world's gold production, as pointed out in President Taft's message at the opening of Congress, must be held largely responsible.

The following figures from the report of the Director of the Mint for 1909 show the production of gold in recent years:

Year.	Gold production in the United States.	Production of gold in the world.
1890	$32,845,000	$118,800,000
1896	53,088,600	202,251,000
1897	57,363,000	236,073,700
1898	64,463,000	286,879,700
1899	71,053,400	306,724,100
1900	79,171,000	254,576,300
1901	78,606,700	260,992,000
1902	80,000,000	296,737,600
1903	73,591,700	327,702,700
1904	80,464,700	347,377,200
1905	88,180,700	380,288,700
1906	94,373,800	402,503,000
1907	90,435,700	412,532,900
1908	94,560,000	443,400,000

These figures show that in less than twenty years the world's production has quadrupled. How little have the facts justified the predictions made in certain political campaigns as to the fate of this vanishing metal! The Treasury Department's report of money in circulation in the United States shows the same trend:

January 1, 1910	$3,100,000,000
January 1, 1905	2,500,000,000
January 1, 1900	1,900,000,000
January 1, 1895	1,600,000,000

In the past fifteen years our circulation has almost doubled.

Year ending June 30—	Actual circulation per capita.	Relative circulation per capita (1899=100).
1896	$21.41	83.7
1897	22.87	89.4
1898	25.15	98.3
1899	25.58	100.0
1900	26.94	105.3
1901	27.98	109.4
1902	28.43	111.1
1903	29.42	115.0
1904	30.77	120.3
1905	31.08	121.5
1906	32.32	126.3
1907	32.22	129.6
1908	34.72	135.7
1909	34.93	136.6

Surely an increase in per capita circulation in fifteen years of almost 50 per cent, an increase in total circulation of almost 100 per cent, and an increase in the world's production of gold of about 225 per cent in the same period have had their effect in producing the present price situation.

HIGH PRICES IN FREE-TRADE ENGLAND.

Mention has been made of the fact that high prices are world-wide, and particularly has this increase of recent years been apparent in free-trade Great Britain. In this connection the following statement from the London Express for November, 1909, will be particularly pertinent:

A volume of statistics issued on Saturday from the board of agriculture is a damaging answer to the claims of the free traders that food prices remain almost stationary in a country without tariffs.

One of the many promises made by the Liberals before the last general election was that under a free-trade government the price of the necessities of life could not increase, and that tariff reform meant dearer food. These statistics show conclusively that it is free trade that means dearer food. In the last three years the price of nearly every article of food has increased.

Further, Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, in the American Federationist, January, 1910, makes the following statement:

"How often do these people eat meat?" is a question the American in Europe finds himself asking when looking about among wage-workers. Meat is usually from 25 to 100 per cent higher in price than in the United States.

Confirming the statement that record-breaking industrial activity has followed the operation of the new tariff law, a few figures appertaining to our agriculture and commerce are presented:

FARM STATISTICS.

BANK CLEARINGS.

As the completed figures for the year 1909 are made up it becomes evident how general and substantial was the recovery in every line of business as compared with the year of uncertainties that preceded it.

The total bank clearings for the year exceed $165,000,000,000, setting a new record for the Nation's exchanges by exceeding the best previous record of $160,000,000,000 made in 1906. The following totals for the past sixteen years, according to the New York Chronicle, show that in that period bank exchanges have nearly quadrupled:

1909	$165,608,879,423
1907	145,175,733,493

And this splendid result is exclusive of the corporation tax which goes into effect March 1.

FAILURES.

There were fewer failures in the United States in 1909 than in the preceding year. According to the figures reported by Messrs. R. G. Dun & Co., the total number in 1909 was 12,924 as against 15,690 the year before, and the total liabilities were $154,000,000 as against $222,000,000.

FOR EXAMPLE.

Price increased on free list: Cotton, cotton-seed oil, and coal.

Price decreased or unchanged bearing tariff duty: Steel rails, sugar, and tableware.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy most of the time allotted to me by asking questions from some member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and I presume, as the chairman is present, I will interrogate him. I desire to ask these questions of some member of this committee, because they are the persons best informed among us as to these matters. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, having occupied much time in the study of these questions, and having extraordinary opportunities to secure information, are easily our best source for information on the questions on which I desire information.

I have received numerous letters from constituents who seem convinced that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads intend to present in the House a bill making the rates of postage on newspapers and magazines several hundred per cent higher than they now are, and to thus deprive the farmer of these great sources of information. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee if this is true?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the President in his annual message last December called the attention of Congress to the fact that it was costing more to carry second-class mail than the Government was receiving for the service. The Postmaster-General made the same suggestion in his annual report. This part of the President's message was referred to the Post-Office Committee, which has been investigating the subject, but is not ready to make a report; and there is nothing in the appropriation bill now pending that relates to the subject.

Mr. REEDER. Is there any effort being made, to your knowledge, to raise the postal rate on second-class mail to any great extent?

Mr. WEEKS. There is no bill before our committee to increase these rates, and no disposition, as far as I know, on the part of anyone to make other than a very reasonable raise of the postal rate on second-class mail.

Mr. REEDER. These letters generally state that the railroads carry matter for the express companies at very much cheaper rates than the railroads carry the same kind of matter for the Government in the way of mails. Is that true?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think anyone can definitely answer that question. The Post-Office Department has sent out to all railroads in the United States a very comprehensive list of questions for the purpose of obtaining all the information possible regarding the relations of the railroads to the carrying of the mails. The Post-Office Committee has no information as to the exact terms the railroads impose in hauling express cars, but there are a great many differences in the service which should be called to the attention of the gentleman from Kansas if he wishes to make a comparison of those services. The postal car carries about 2 tons of mail matter on an average, while the express car carries about 12 tons of matter. The railroad furnishes a large amount of equipment for the conduct of the postal service. Both at terminals and elsewhere when a post-office is within 80 rods of the railroad station the railroad transports, without charge, the mail to and from the post-office. The railroad furnishes apartment cars, where the space furnished is less than 40 feet in the car, without any charge for the space. In the case of express companies terminal charges are made. If any space is used in the terminal station, charge is made for it by the railroad. If room is required by the Post-Office Department, it is furnished by the railroad gratis, and it also furnishes water, light, and heat, all without charge. There are a great number of different conditions governing these services, and any statement relating to them can not be accurate unless all these conditions are taken into account.

I ought to add that the express companies pay the railroads about 50 per cent of their gross receipts for the service which the railroads perform. The Government is paying about $50,000,000 a year for railroad transportation. The gross receipts which the Government receives from mails are substantially $220,000,000 a year. In other words, we are paying for the transportation of mail not more than 22 to 23 per cent of our gross receipts, while the express companies are paying substantially 50 per cent of their gross receipts.

Mr. REEDER. Considering all the circumstances, are the railroads paid more for carrying express than they are for carrying the same weight of mail for the same distance?

Mr. WEEKS. Well, I am not prepared to answer that question definitely. Those members of the Post-Office Committee who have given a great deal of attention to that subject are under the impression that about a fair rate is being paid to railroad companies, but that it should be rearranged, so that some roads would receive more than at present and some less. I think that there are some railroads which are probably receiving less than they should for the service which they perform, and there are other railroads which are being paid more than they should be.

Mr. REEDER. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee this question: What does the Government receive per pound for carrying magazines through the mails?

Mr. WEEKS. The Government receives a cent a pound.

Mr. REEDER. What does it cost the Government per pound to transport these magazines?

Mr. WEEKS. The Postmaster-General in his report states that it costs about 9 cents a pound, but in making up that cost the figures used include many items which to my mind should not be charged to second-class mail. For instance, the deficit in the Rural Delivery Service is estimated to be $28,000,000. Forty-five per cent of the mail carried over rural routes is second class, therefore in making up its figures the Post-Office Department says 45 per cent of $28,000,000 should be charged to second-class mail. I think the propriety of making this charge to second-class mail is very doubtful, because it may be possible that the department has included among its items of cost those which should be charged to some other account.

Mr. REEDER. What per cent would the gentleman say is the difference?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not come to a conclusion myself, but my guess is that it costs between 2 and 3 cents a pound to carry second-class mail.

Mr. REEDER. I will here insert the figures of the Postmaster-General by which he proves that the Government loses over $60,000,000 per annum in the carrying of second-class mail, or over 7 cents per pound:

The public paid in 1909 84 cents per pound for 157,500,000 pounds of first-class mail matter, which netted a profit of $53,674,194.62. The publishers paid in the same year 1 cent per pound for 792,500,000 pounds of second-class mail matter, which netted a loss of $64,128,026.91.

Hence the public paid over 7,000 per cent (to be exact 7,249) per cent) more per pound to mail our letters than the publishers did to mail their periodicals and magazines for 1909.

Mr. REEDER. I will ask the gentleman this question: Would the publishers of these magazines, in your judgment, be justified in raising the price of subscription to the readers of the magazine in case the mail rate is raised 50 per cent?

Mr. WEEKS. The publishers have notified the Post-Office Committee that they will raise their subscription price if any increase is made in the rates charged for transportation.

Mr. REEDER. What amount would it add to the price of a copy of the magazine, I mean a single copy of an ordinary magazine, if the rates were raised 50 per cent?

Mr. WEEKS. It would depend altogether on the weight of the magazine.

Mr. REEDER. I understand it would. But, say an ordinary magazine.

Mr. WEEKS. If the magazine weighed a pound and the rates were doubled, it would add a cent a pound.

Mr. REEDER. Then a raise of 50 per cent would add one-half a cent to a single magazine, or 6 cents to a year's subscription of a monthly publication.

Mr. WEEKS. The Curtis Publishing Company informed the Post-Office Committee that it now costs them $300,000 for postage. If the rates were doubled, it would, of course, cost $600,000.

Mr. REEDER. What would a raise of 50 per cent on the postal rate on second-class mail add to the postal revenue of the Government?

Mr. WEEKS. It would add about three and one-half millions of dollars.

Mr. REEDER. Can you tell me what per cent of their incomes the publishers of magazines get from subscriptions?

Mr. WEEKS. The Post-Office Committee has no definite information in regard to that.

Mr. LLOYD. Would you say it would double the receipts on second-class matter if the rates were doubled? It would increase the zone within which the publisher used freight and express?

Mr. WEEKS. I think I should put some limitation on my answer. If the zone in which the publishers use express service or freight were not increased, it would double the receipts from second-class mail if a raise of 1 cent a pound were made, but undoubtedly the zone would be increased somewhat, so that it would only be an estimate and it would probably be too high.

Mr. REEDER. You mean they would use the express companies to transport their mail?

Mr. WEEKS. Express and freight.

Mr. REEDER. Would this indicate that magazines and newspapers now use the express companies for short hauls and the mails for long hauls?

Mr. WEEKS. Express companies charge less in limited zones than the postal rates, but I want to add that great numbers of periodicals are carried by freight and distributed by local express or in some other way. For instance, the Curtis Publishing Company sends a large number of its publications to its distributing points, and then they are sent out by their own distributing agencies, either by local express or otherwise.

Mr. REEDER. Did you give your opinion as to what per cent of the receipts of magazine publishers comes from subscription?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think anybody has those figures.

Mr. REEDER. What is your best judgment as to what portion of the revenue received by magazines and newspapers which are carried as second-class mail comes from subscriptions and what part from advertising?

Mr. WEEKS. Different publications have very different percentages. I think one magazine publisher has told me that 75 per cent of his magazines went to individual subscribers. On the other hand, it is quite likely with some magazines that not more than 10 per cent go to individual subscribers.

Mr. REEDER. I was asking as to the cash receipts of these papers and magazines—their sources of profits. Could you make an estimate as to what per cent comes from advertising? What I desire to learn is, Will the subscriber suffer if the magazines pay a higher rate of postage and these subscribers are only charged their pro rata of the increase? Will it come from the magazine proprietors or the person who advertises or the subscribers, if the subscribers are treated fairly? You will observe we insist on a square deal in Kansas.

Mr. WEEKS. Somebody would have to suffer if the publishers pay more for their transportation. Either it will come out of the treasury of the publisher or a higher charge will be made for advertising or a higher subscription price will be charged.

Mr. REEDER. Can you help me to locate the persons who are likely to pay the extra postage?

Mr. WEEKS. I can not locate that for you.

Mr. REEDER. You agree it would be simply one-half cent more a copy, whoever pays it?

Mr. WEEKS. It would if the copy weighed a pound and the rate were raised from 1 cent a pound to a cent and a half a pound.

Mr. REEDER. I am judging that magazines would weigh less than a pound ordinarily. What does the average magazine weigh?

Mr. WEEKS. About a pound.

Mr. REEDER. If the advertisers pay twice as much, which is surely below the amount they do pay, as the subscribers pay toward the income of the magazines and newspapers coming under this class of postage and the increase of one-half cent a copy, or 6 cents a year, were divided on this basis, the subscriber, if he paid no more than his share and the magazine owner paid none of the additional postage, the subscriber would only pay 2 cents a year more than at present for his subscription. If the owner of the magazine paid one-half of the raise of 50 per cent in postage and the other half were prorated as above, then the subscriber would only pay 1 cent additional for a full year's subscription to his magazine. Is this a true statement?

Mr. WEEKS. It probably is.

Mr. REEDER. Then some one has fooled these readers of magazines, who think they are to be largely or wholly deprived of reading matter if a little less of the actual expense of carrying certain person's wares to their customers is donated by the Government.

Mr. WEEKS. If the periodicals you are talking about weighed a pound and the rates were raised 50 per cent, assuming that it is a monthly, it would cost the publisher 6 cents a year more for postage than at present. This, of course, would be paid by the subscriber or the advertiser or the publisher, or all of them. Many publications are extremely profitable, and naturally their owners do not like to give up any of their profits, so they have led their subscribers to believe that they, the subscribers, would be the sufferers.

Mr. REEDER. I note that the railroads and the magazines tell quite a different story in discussing this subject.

Mr. STERLING. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. REEDER. Does the gentleman desire to ask me a question?

Mr. STERLING. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman who has the floor. Assuming that the increased postage would raise the subscription price of the magazines, do you think that is any justification for not increasing the postage to what it would actually cost the Government? Ought not the readers of the magazines to be willing to pay what it really costs and not impose a burden upon everybody, whether they are subscribers to magazines or not?

Mr. REEDER. Generally they would. But they have been led to believe this raise, if we have a raise, will be such a burden as will make it impossible almost for people to secure such literature, whereas if the subscriber pays only his share of a 50 per cent raise on the postage it will cost him only 1 cent a year for a monthly magazine weighing 1 pound.

If the Government is paying a higher rate to the railroads for carrying the mail than the express companies pay for the same class of freight for like distances and under the same conditions, then I think there should be complaint on the part of the people as well as the publishers, and Congress should pass a law to remedy such an injustice, and no one will go further than I will to do so. I have hopes to get at the truth of this matter and get it before the people, so we may remedy the wrongs of our postal system, whether the wrong is against publishers, the Government, or the subscribers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield fifteen minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. REEDER. I will try to get through in the fifteen minutes by being as brief as possible.

I have here some statements which were sent to Members of the House by a committee on railway-mail pay:

They state that reductions aggregating $8,500,000 per annum, or 17 per cent of the total railway mail pay for the year ending June 30, 1909, were made in the face of large increases in the cost of labor and materials used in railroad operation.

I will ask the chairman [Mr. WEEKS], Is this true?

Mr. WEEKS. It is practically true.

Mr. REEDER. They state that in 1907 the postal deficit was $6,653,283. In 1909 it was $17,441,719, an increase of 162 per cent in the deficit. During the same period the postal revenues increased $19,977,378, from $183,585,005 to $203,562,383, or 19 per cent, and as tonnage of second-class mail was practically the same—only 2 per cent more—it shows at once the deficit was due to other causes than increase in second-class mail. The pay to the railroads was the same in both years, although the ton miles of service increased 14 per cent.

I would like for the chairman to state, is this true or false?

Mr. WEEKS. It is partially true; but many other conditions than those in the question would have to be taken into consideration to give a definite answer.

Mr. REEDER. The report shows the revenues and expenditures of the Post-Office Department per pound by classes of mail handled—Postmaster-General's 1909 report—itemized as to payments to railroads and other expenses. On first-class mail the Government received a revenue of 84 cents per pound. The total expense of handling was 49.92 cents, of which 5.56 cents, or only 11 per cent, was paid to the railroads and 89 per cent for other expenses. On second-class mail the total expense was 9.23 cents, of which 3.19 cents, or 34 per cent, was paid to the railroads and 66 per cent for all other expenses. In the case of the first-class mail matter the Government pays the railroads 6.6 per cent of the gross earnings for handling; in the case of the second-class mail, 290 per cent of the gross earnings.

I desire to ask Mr. WEEKS, Is this statement true?

Mr. WEEKS. It is partially true.

Mr. REEDER. The report shows that for a 60-foot railway postal car carriers receive 5.5 cents per mile hauled, according to the scheduled railway post-office-car rates. These cars weigh about 50 tons, so the average earning per gross ton-mile hauled is 1.1 mills. The department on many lines uses the car one way only, forcing the carriers to haul it back empty, so that on such lines the car-mile earning would be reduced to 2.8 cents, or about the same earnings per mile as from one and one-half first-class passengers, and the ton-mile earning to six-tenths of a mill. From published railway tariffs we find that for hauling empty passenger cars, which weigh much less, the railroads receive 11 cents a car-mile, or 2.4 mills a ton-mile; that to haul empty baggage, express, and mail cars in passenger trains they receive 8 cents to 15 cents a car-mile, or from 2.2 mills to 4.2 mills per ton-mile—twice to four times as much as they receive from the Government. To move empty freight cars in freight trains carriers receive more than they receive for moving postal cars in passenger trains, and when the revenue accruing from moving loaded freight cars in freight trains is considered the disparity becomes almost incredible.

Will the chairman state whether this is true or false?

Mr. WEEKS. That is practically correct, if I understand the question.

Mr. REEDER. The Railway Post-Office Pay says it is the popular impression that the compensation paid the railways for railway post-office cars is a rental simply. Nothing could be more erroneous. The pay covers not only the exclusive use—a very small part, indeed, of the expense to the carrier—but the very burdensome and expensive duty of hauling the car—a fully equipped post-office on wheels—in fast passenger trains, in which mail is assorted and distributed en route by a corps of clerks to expedite its delivery at intermediate points and terminals. These cars are hauled in trains, next to baggage cars, with ample cubic capacity to carry all mail tendered, and to earn all transportation charges prescribed by law, but for public convenience the department provides these moving post-offices, weighing 12.4 per cent of the average passenger train. For the use and cost of hauling this car ridiculously inadequate railway post-office pay is allowed.

Is this statement true or false?

Mr. WEEKS. The figures given are, I think, correct; there is a question whether the rates are entirely inadequate, however.

Mr. REEDER. The Railway Post-Office Pay makes the following statements:

On short hauls express rates are lower than second-class postal rates, because postal rates are made regardless of distance, while express rates take account of distance carried. Therefore, for long distances express rates are much higher, and the only fair comparison that can be made is one based on average hauls.

Considering the conditions and reciprocal obligations, express is far more attractive and remunerative than mail traffic, and would be so though the ton-mile earnings from express are far less. Bearing in mind that economical train operation means good car loading and good train loading, express is handled with baggage in cars loaded to full capacity; mail requires a post-office on wheels, with space for mail racks and postal clerks working en route, loaded with an average of but 2 tons, or one-seventh full-weight capacity. The design and specifications of the post-office car are made by the department regardless of expense, as the carrier pays; and, therefore, because of its special fittings for post-office use, is much more costly to build, equip, maintain, and haul in trains, as its dead weight is 50 per cent greater than baggage and express cars. On the other hand, it brings in less revenue, as its net carrying capacity for mail is not more than 2½ tons, whilst express cars, having no space taken up with special fittings and equipment, can be loaded to 15 or 20 tons. Mails are handled on the fastest trains, often compromising their schedules, and special expenses are imposed on the carriers to transfer at junctions, handle free at terminals and into intermediate stations; fines and deductions are made for delay, etc., all of which are charges against gross mail revenue. In the case of express the carriers' compensation is increased by services rendered by express companies, such as free carriage of remittances and packages, express messengers acting as baggagemen, joint station agents and employees, etc.

Under existing contracts the carriers are paid from 50 per cent to 55 per cent of the gross earnings of express companies for the transportation service rendered by the carriers. If the railroads were to offer the Post-Office Department the more favorable contracts which it is thought the express companies enjoy, the railroads would expect, say, 50 per cent of the gross earnings of the department, and their pay from all sources for the carriage of mail would be raised from $49,700,000 to over $102,000,000. Express companies pay the railroads 50 per cent to 55 per cent of their gross earnings for transportation; the department pays only 24 per cent. The department retains 76 per cent of its gross earnings and shows a large deficit yearly; the express companies retain 45 per cent of theirs and after paying all expenses of collecting, delivering, messenger hire, etc., pay handsome dividends to their stockholders. The Post-Office Department conducts its traffic regardless of all well-founded principles of economy—and very properly so—solely for public convenience, and the beneficiary should expect to foot reasonable bills for the service. The express companies are required by the carriers to handle their traffic with strict regard to economy.

Any comparison of mail with express or freight rates is valueless unless all conditions are considered and valued, such as average haul, character, and flexibility of contracts and of service rendered. The higher ton-mile rate may when modified by conditions be the less remunerative to the carrier. On the average passenger train carrying mail, express, and passengers, 12.4 per cent of the weight of the train is devoted to post-office features not needed by the carrier to accommodate mail tonnage, and is therefore a special charge demanding a much higher ton-mile rate for mail alone to yield the same net return as express and passengers. In 1908, passenger train earnings from all sources were $674,042,400; 12.4 per cent of the weight of trains should have yielded the railroads $83,581,258, whereas the total payment for handling mail was but $49,737,519.

Mail traffic is of a class distinctly higher than express, and on account of light loading, only 2 tons average per car, must be classed as less than carload business, whilst express traffic in full carloads, with no special additional equipment, approximates carload business. Wide differences in ton-mile rates are sanctioned by law because of classification and size of load.

A greater disparity in rates is found in freight trains. Coal or ore is moved in the same train with silk, hops, automobiles, willow ware, yet the carriage of the low-grade commodity might yield a larger net return to the carrier because of the much heavier load in the car, less exactions of the shipper, less risk of damage, etc. The following illustrates the wide range of ton-mile rates in freight service:

Freight rates per 100 pounds, Chicago to St. Paul.

Passenger vehicles	L. C. L.	$2.10
Motocycles	do	1.50
Chairs	do	1.20
Dry goods	do	.60
Sugar, coffee	do	.25
Agricultural implements	do	.40
Agricultural implements	C. L.	.20
Bar iron	L. C. L.	.25
Bar iron	C. L.	.14
Pig iron	do	.14
Hard coal	do	.10

The range in rates for freight carried in the same train is from unity to twenty times as much, due to difference in classification and size of load, other conditions of transportation being identical. In the case of second-class mail and express the range is extremely small. In the case of freight rates a disparity is also noted of 80 per cent to 100 per cent between carload and less than carload rates on the same material.

Are these statements true or false?

Mr. WEEKS. That question is so long that it is impossible to answer it definitely, but I think the statements in it are substantially in accord with the facts.

Mr. REEDER. Then I note that newspapers and magazines make quite a different class of statements.

I have before me an advance sheet of an editorial which came to my desk recently. By a circle they inclose territory containing 46.4 per cent of the population of the United States, with St. Louis in the center, and state that in this territory the express companies carry St. Louis papers for one-half cent per pound and deliver them. They then enlarge the circle until it includes the Gulf, Atlantic, and Lake coasts, and in this territory they claim the express companies carry St. Louis papers for 1 cent per pound.

Then they say that Canada carries all mail from coast to coast for one-fourth cent per pound. Are these statements true; and if true, how account for our higher rates?

Mr. WEEKS. Express companies do not usually deliver papers or periodicals except to the news dealer. The proportion of periodicals carried by express is probably not greater than 2 per cent.

Canada has put a prohibitive rate on foreign periodicals crossing the line—4 cents a pound—to build up local periodicals.

Rates of pay to employees in Canada are only about two-thirds what they are in this country. There is no rural service. Railroads are subsidized and are paid by order of the governor-general and council a rate sufficient only to prevent a deficit.

The rates at which periodicals are carried and the methods of carrying them are very different in different classes of periodicals. Some periodicals are sent out very largely through the American News Company. That company ships these magazines by freight to some distributing point and then distributes them through newsdealers. On the other hand, many magazines are sent directly through the mails to individual subscribers; in very many instances magazines are sent by the makers from the place of publication to the place of destination by freight. Freight is used in shipping publications long distances much more generally than the express companies, express companies being confined to local service; but beyond about a thousand-mile zone they all go by mail.

Mr. REEDER. In your judgment, as I understand you, only one-third of the actual cost to our Government of carrying the magazines and newspapers through the mails is paid by the publishers, and the other two-thirds of the cost to the Government for carrying this mail is donated to these publishers by the Government?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not understand that question.

Mr. REEDER. It is this: The publishers pay only 1 cent a pound for carrying their mail. The cost to the Government of performing this service for the publishers is, in your judgment, 3 cents a pound.

Mr. WEEKS. It costs 3 cents a pound to send freight to San Francisco. We carry a pound of second-class mail at a cent a pound to any part of the country.

Mr. REEDER. Then, we get one-third pay for carrying this class of mail, and the other two-thirds is donated to the publishers, as it is their business to publish magazines and deliver these magazines to their customers.

Mr. WEEKS. An answer that I made to the gentleman a little while ago may be repeated; the cost is, in my judgment, from 2 to 3 cents a pound.

Mr. REEDER. That practically answers the question in the affirmative, and, as I have proved before in this speech, if the rate on this class of mail were increased 50 per cent, the publishers would still enjoy a donation from the Government of one-half of what it costs the Government to perform this service of carrying these publishers' wares and delivering the same to their customers; and if this increase of rate of 50 per cent were equitably apportioned among the publishers, the advertisers, and the subscribers, only 1 cent per annum extra would be charged to the subscribers for papers and magazines.

Mr. Speaker, this being true, I want to hurry the news to Kansas that we are still safe if we raise a good crop of corn, hogs, cattle, and wheat, and the grand old Republican party remains in power so that our friends the insurgents can not, with their boycott, cut the prices too much on farm products. If we can continue to get about $1 for our wheat, 8 cents for our hogs, 7½ cents for our beef, and 75 cents for our corn, we can stand a square deal on this second-class postage, as it will only cost us 1 cent per annum on each periodical we subscribe for.

Let the readers of these publications get their coats off and see that we get a fair divvy of the 6 cents extra a magazine or newspaper will cost in postage if the bad old Republican party should add 50 per cent to the postal rate on second-class mail.

The Post-Office Department insists that, by a fair method of figuring, we donate $64,000,000 annually to the publishers of second-class mail. If these figures are true, and these publishers would pay only one-half what it costs to carry their mail, we could have a 1-cent letter rate of postage and wipe out our annual postal deficit, and a fair divide of the raise could not possibly add 25 cents a copy to a yearly subscription, which we would save on 25 letters.

I will here insert a few letters to show what persons have been led to believe as to these postal rates:

Hon. WILLIAM A. REEDER,
Congressman Sixth District Kansas,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We believe the proposed increase of postal rates for farm papers and magazines is an injustice to the farmer and inadvisable, if not dangerous as a precedent.

We earnestly hope you will do your utmost to prevent this mistaken policy.

Hon. WILLIAM A. REEDER.

DEAR SIR: I have been talking with my neighbors, and we believe the proposed increase of postal rates on farm papers and magazines is a terrible mistake and an injustice to the farmer and workingman, and we hope you will do your best to defeat the bill.

Hon. WM. A. REEDER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: According to press reports there is soon to be introduced in Congress a bill to increase the postage on farm papers, etc., from 1 cent to 5 cents per pound. This seems to be another blow at farmers in general and I hope you will use your influence against it.

Mr. W. A. REEDER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I believe the proposed increase of postal rates for farm papers and magazines is an injustice to the farmer and inadvisable, if not dangerous as a precedent. I hope you will do your utmost to prevent this mistaken policy.

Hon. WILLIAM A. REEDER.

DEAR SIR: I believe the proposed increase of postal rates for farm papers and magazines is not only an injustice, but an injury to the farmer and inadvisable, if not dangerous, as a precedent. I hope you will do your utmost to prevent this mistaken policy.

Hon. W. A. REEDER.

DEAR SIR: I believe the proposed increase of postal rates for papers is an injustice to the farmers; inadvisable, if not dangerous. I hope you will do your utmost to prevent its passage.

WILLIAM A. REEDER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I believe the proposed increase of postal rates for farm papers and magazines is an injustice to the farmer and inadvisable, if not dangerous, as a precedent. I hope you will do your utmost to prevent this mistaken policy.

Mr. REEDER.

DEAR SIR: I thought that I would write you a line to know where you stand on the question of raising the price on newspapers. You know that if such a thing would take place the people of this Nation would be at the mercy of the money power.

Hon. W. A. REEDER.

DEAR SIR: I see by the papers that a bill is to be introduced in the Congress to raise the postage on newspapers to 5 cents a pound. I can hardly believe that Congress will depart from its long-established rule of low rates of postage on the very class of papers in which the public is most vitally interested.

Hon. WILLIAM A. REEDER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We earnestly request you to use your influence to kill a certain bill. The bill is to increase the postal rate on the farmers' most useful reading matter—an outrage and a mistaken policy. This is the sentiment of most all of the farmers in your district.

Hon. W. A. REEDER:

I write to you in regard to this move on the raising of rates on second-class mail matter. Now I take several trade journals and they request their subscribers to do what they can for them. It would be a bad blow to us if they had to quit their publication or raise their rates of subscription.

Mr. REEDER.

KIND SIR: I hope you will use your influence to crush the bill that will raise the postage rate on papers, magazines, etc., as it will cause lots of poor people to get along without reading matter, and be a burden that no one needs to bear.

These people are honest in their convictions and really believe that the Government is about to inaugurate a policy which will deprive them of much of their reading matter.

They seem badly frightened, and I concede they had me shaking in my boots at the prospect of some great, impending calamity which was to engulf our fair State and its superb citizenship. By the way, our State justly boasts the highest average of intelligence of any State in the Union, if we bar a small corner of the State in my friend CAMPBELL's district which is largely populated by foreign miners.

Mr. Chairman, I shall now read you a letter from a constituent who takes a more optimistical view of the situation. As this letter came to hand to-day, I shall be compelled to ask the permission of the writer later to read this letter or ask his pardon for so doing.

DALE, KANS., February 16, 1910.

WM. A. REEDER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed find two clippings from Mail and Breeze.

This Mail and Breeze is a farm journal of much more than ordinary merit. Its editor's name is Thomas McNeal. I state this so you may understand the letter. The smaller clipping, as the writer of this letter designates it, is from this Mail and Breeze and says:

TO PREVENT A GREAT MISTAKE.

In a few days, without the full knowledge of the American people, a bill is to be introduced in Congress for increasing the postage rate on farm papers, magazines, and other periodicals from 1 cent per pound to 5 cents per pound.

I wish to ask the chairman of the committee, Is this statement true?

Mr. WEEKS. The writer is mistaken in making the statement quoted.

Mr. REEDER. Further on in this smaller clipping it says:

The express companies carry matter of this class on the railroads for less money than the Government and make a good profit at it. And the railroads carry passengers at the same rate as the Government's second-class mail matter and make money at the business.

Is this statement true, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. WEEKS. I can not take your time to answer that statement in great detail, but, in a word, express companies only compete with the mails for distances less than 500 miles. The revenue from a carload of passengers is much greater than from a mail car.

Mr. REEDER. The same clipping closes thus:

If the proposed bill passes, the people on the farms will be obliged to pay much more than at present for their best and most useful class of reading matter. The only way to stop it is for each reader to write a protest—write it at once and mail it immediately to his Congressman. We believe this is very important and very necessary. People all over the country are doing this. Let every reader of Farmers' Mail and Breeze write to some Congressman to-day to the following effect: "I believe the proposed increase of postal rates for farm papers and magazines is an injustice to the farmer and inadvisable, if not dangerous, as a precedent. I hope you will do your utmost to prevent this mistaken policy."

The Kansas Congressmen, in the order of their districts, are: D. R. ANTHONY, CHARLES F. SCOTT, PHILIP P. CAMPBELL, JAMES M. MILLER, WILLIAM A. CALDERHEAD, WILLIAM A. REEDER, E. H. MADISON, VICTOR MURDOCK. A letter will reach any of them if addressed: House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Oklahoma's Congressmen are BIRD S. MCGUIRE, Elmer L. Fulton, James S. Davenport, C. D. CARTER, SCOTT FERRIS.

Is this true, Mr. Chairman, except as to the names of the Congressmen from Kansas and Oklahoma?

Mr. WEEKS. The writer seems to give the impression that the President's suggestion applied only to farm papers and magazines, when he probably knows that it applies to all second-class mail matter—that is, to all papers and periodicals.

It sounds to me as if he were making large profits, largely due to the Government's carrying his paper for less than the service costs, and he appeals to the prejudices of his subscribers to pull his chestnuts out of the fire. I do not believe he is publishing his paper for any other purpose than for profit, and he writes as if he were not willing to pay the Government what it costs to perform his transportation service. In other words, he is getting a subsidy and does not wish to be disturbed.

Mr. REEDER. I will now read further from the letter:

The smaller "Tom's wail" caused me to investigate, and I find this paper contains 64 pages, 12½ of reading matter and 51½ of advertising, including title-page; price, $1 per year; weekly. Now, this is a good sample of the farm papers and magazines that are crying for cheap postage. A small per cent of the reading matter is valuable, but most of it consists of theories that would "bust" any farmer that attempted to follow them. The price is from two to eight times that charged for newspapers—reading matter considered—and the price received from advertisers must be large. Therefore, I believe Tom's wail should not be considered and the proposed advance is very conservative.

The inclosed advertisement presents a problem that I believe should receive the attention of Congress or the Postal Department. (Not this one in particular, but the class which this one illustrates:)

That's why I will send a 25-pound pail absolutely free to you and to every reader of this paper, where I have no agent, who fills out and sends me coupon below.

Is my offer fair? Do you risk one cent by accepting this $3.50 pail free? Is it worth a 2-cent stamp to make $3.50? If so, just fill out this coupon and mail to-day.

WHAT OTHERS SAY.

WILBUR STOCK FOOD COMPANY,

GENTLEMEN: I have been feeding Wilbur's Stock Tonic for some time, with best results. I feed it daily to horses, cows, and hogs, and find it does everything you claim for it. I have fed other kinds, but they are nowhere to compare with yours. I never expect to be without Wilbur's Stock Tonic.

Yours, truly,

WILBUR STOCK FOOD COMPANY,

In regard to Wilbur's Stock Tonic, I can say I think it is all right. I have had two or three horses die and several sick ones, but since I commenced using your stock tonic I haven't lost a horse or had one to be sick that I know of. I have been using it for the past two years.

Yours, truly,
G. W. BEAVERS,

DEAR SIR: Your stock tonic is the best I ever used to bring up run-down horses. I could not get my horses to improve until I commenced to feed your tonic. They are fattening up, and I feed only half the grain I did before, and my cattle are doing well; in fact, everything I feed it to. Would not be without it again.

Yours, truly,
J. O. MCNUTT,

I use this one to illustrate, because I have tried it out, after filling out and forwarding the coupon. They advised me to send $14 for four pails, and they would give me one free, to which I made no reply. They then followed with an additional offer of a $15 American watch, and later yet, added five $1 knives, one knife with each pail. I then asked them to forward the trial pail, as advertised, or take my name off their mailing list. I have not heard from them since. While this class of advertisements may be legally honest, it is very misleading, and represents a large per cent of the advertisements carried in the farm papers and magazines, and I believe should be excluded from the mails.

Very truly, yours,
F. F. CUTLER.

The editor of a magazine or a newspaper serves in a field of great opportunities.

Persons entrusted with such chances to be of service to their fellows, especially if endowed with ability to improve these opportunities, have a great obligation resting on them.

We all insist on more perfect living at the hands of a minister of the Gospel than we do of others. The editor is also held to a higher standard of truthfulness and honesty, because of the great audience he meets daily and the peculiar access he has to their minds and hearts.

I am glad to be able to assert that a very large percentage of these ministers and editors meet this demand on them for upright, honest living in a way which gives great hopes for the future of our civilization, of which they form so essential a part of the foundation.

It is true, we concede to an editor the privilege of some exaggeration in favor of a policy he may wish to advance, yet a very strong condemnation is due those editors who will falsify in order to carry their point.

When these misrepresentations are directed against a public servant they are to be doubly deplored.

The acts or words of a public servant are public property and should be discussed and criticised by those opposed to such acts or statements.

But the editor who uses his ability and the circulation of his paper to create false impressions as to persons holding public place in the Government thereby discredits the Government.

Such editors as the one who, by the editorials in his own columns, asserts that Congressman SMITH, of California, denounced him as preaching anarchy, surely comes under this class when he heads an article directed against a committee of Congress thus: "Fresh robbery."

The only possible motive of this editor in his efforts to create an impression that the members of this committee are thieves seems to be to retain a certain special privilege of paying about one-third of the actual cost to other citizens—the Government—of certain services rendered to him by the Government.

Such insinuations, and especially when they seem to class therein the President, who has stood before the people with such honor, integrity, and ability in so many positions of responsibility as has President Taft, is surely doing what he can toward discrediting the Government, and therefore deserves the condemnation of all good citizens.

Such editors also make it plain, in my judgment, to all public servants that regardless of their conception as to what is right, or as to their duty to the masses, they must give these editors what they demand or suffer a fight against great odds in weapons—sometimes sustained by statements not warranted by facts.

I can not refrain, in this connection, from mentioning a circumstance which occurred in my last campaign and since.

I stated in my speeches and published in a great Democratic daily, which circulates in my district, that I would vote in the caucus for some other Republican than Mr. CANNON for Speaker. Every Republican member of the caucus knows that this is exactly what I did. This great Democratic daily stated later that I did not do as I had promised. I immediately set forth the truth through the press. This same editor continues to reiterate this false statement to his readers, and thus uses the advantage of his circulation to create an impression which he knows to be false. Whether this editor desires to force me to put up, or whether his wish to discredit Republicans is so great as to justify in his conception of right falsehood as a weapon, I am not able to say. I can not conceive of any possible motive but one of these two.

I feel safe in asserting that such an attack is mean and cowardly, based on no higher code than the ethics of the fisticuff contests as they prevailed in the early settlement of central Illinois.

Even a friend of a fighter would not permit his friend to use a weapon not furnished to his opponent in those early contests.

Such misrepresentations are vastly more criminal when we consider that such use of a great power simply leaves a man in public life one of three alternatives:

First. Quit public life.

Second. Make a fight against much more effective weapons than he has at his command.

Third. Putting up in cash or favors of some kind what such an editor figures he can bleed you for, or be blackmailed.

To make sure no wrong inference can be drawn from my statements, I reiterate a public servant's actions and words are public property, and are properly subject to criticism or refutation.

But when an editor goes so far as to deliberately publish falsehoods to discredit a great committee of Congress or public servants individually, he becomes a menace to honesty in politics and an enemy to our form of government.

There is no class who, in my judgment, merit criticism and condemnation more at the hands of all good citizens than such editors.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas twenty-five minutes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. With the enactment of the Payne tariff bill the lash of the taxgatherer falls more mercilessly upon the tired shoulders of the American people. It would be difficult to imagine a more signal instance of political treachery than this Republican tariff law of 1909.[3] Summoned by a majority of a million in a voting total of 14 millions to correct the oppressions of its own tariff law, the Dingley law of 1897, the Republican party devised a measure that gave oppression wider sway. Called to reform the tariff, the Republican party deformed it beyond all conscience. Its response to the people's cry for lower taxes was a statute imposing higher taxes. Like the Ethiopian, it could not alter its skin; like the leopard, it could not change its spots. [Laughter and applause.]

In returning the Republican party to power in 1908 the American people evidently forgot the history of this faithless organization. From its first accession to control it has multiplied the burdens and obstructed the advancement of the Republic. From 1860 to 1909 it has erected a veritable stairway of increasing tariff, each more oppressive than the last. Beginning with the colossal emergency tariffs of the American civil war, tariffs tolerated only because of a crisis involving the Nation's life, enacted with the solemn understanding that they would be reduced when the struggle ended, it has kept succeeding tariffs at and above the martial level throughout nearly all the forty-five succeeding years of peace. In the Dingley law of 1897 it established the highest tariff duties the United States had ever known, levying so heartless a tribute on the people that within a few years the demand for tariff revision became almost universal. The spectacular performances of Mr. Roosevelt diverted popular attention to other measures during the seven lurid years of his ascendency. But the tide of the people's anger could not permanently be stayed. Unable longer to ignore the popular demand the Republican party in its national platform of 1908 covenanted to modify the tyrannies of the tariff. It would seem that with so plain a mandate from the people, so plain a promise in its platform, so generous an indorsement at the polls the Republican party would have made serious effort to remedy its own abuses of the tariff.

But what occurred? With a perfidy unapproached in all the ages the Republican party enacted a tariff law carrying a higher average of rates than the law it pretended to revise. The new Republican tariff law can not be excused on the ground of haste or ignorance or fear. For twelve years the Republicans had possessed full opportunity to study the operation of the extortionate Dingley rates. For twelve years they had heard on every side the appeal for a sane and scientific reformation of the customs laws. They were men skilled in every phase of politics and legislation. They selected for the task of revision a time removed as far as possible from the succeeding general elections. It may well be said, therefore, that the Payne tariff law is a deliberate and characteristic Republican product, that it represents the best tariff legislation of which the Republican party is capable. It is evidence, therefore, of the most conclusive character that the Republican party is essentially unable to make a genuine and honest reduction of the tariff. It is evidence, furthermore, of the corrupting influence of high protection. Holding tenaciously to this theory, it is impossible for the Republican party to bring about an adequate readjustment of the tariff rates. It has never done so and it never will. The practical effect of the Republican theory of protection is the taxation of the entire people to guarantee the profits of certain industries.

The benefit reverts principally to the owners of these industries because the labor they employ is in constant competition with the world. Still less is labor helped, because any raise in wages by reason of the tariff is offset by an equal or greater tariff on what the laborer must eat and wear and use. In its final analysis the Republican doctrine of protection creates an aristocracy of the dollar. It grinds the masses to sustain the millionaires; it oppresses the cottage to upbuild the palace. It makes the multitudes in jeans and calico support the few in silks and furs.

It destroys the vital principle of equality before the law without which the Republic can not long survive. It violates the divine command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," substituting for it, "Thou shalt skin thy neighbor for thyself." It overturns the constitutional safeguards for the integrity of property rights. Such are the teachings that pollute the whole fabric of Republican tariff laws and mock every Republican effort to revise them. Powerful as the Republican party is, it can never commit the American people to a permanent acceptance of high protection. After every tariff it has enacted it has been compelled by public sentiment sooner or later to undertake at least a pretended readjustment. The Payne tariff law has been in existence less than seven months, and already the voices of protest are reaching to the heavens.

A careful examination of the Payne tariff law will reveal sufficient basis for the general protest against it. It contains 14 schedules of dutiable articles, lettered alphabetically, and a free list. Let us review the law schedule by schedule. In Schedule A, which deals with chemicals, oils, and paints, there are quite a number of reductions, but the increases are such that the statement of the Republican majority of the Senate Finance Committee, framed to accompany the Payne bill, shows an actual ad valorem increase for the entire schedule. In this schedule the Republicans have reduced the duty on strychnine and raised it on soap. Thus they have made it easier for a man to destroy his body and harder to keep it clean. [Laughter and applause.] Let it be noted that the reductions in this schedule are usually as to articles such as most of the items in the acid section, ammonia, borax, and the like, which can be produced more cheaply here than elsewhere, and consequently afford no substantial relief. In Schedule B, earths, earthenware, and glassware, there are reductions and increases, but the average decrease is immaterial, being less than one-half of 1 per cent. In this schedule the Republican party has reduced the tariff charges on marble and onyx for the mansions of the rich from 30 to 40 per cent, but has made no reduction on cement, an ordinary building necessity, raising some kinds from 55 to 522 per cent.

A characteristic Republican trick is seen in the manipulation of the duty on carbons for electric lighting. Under the Dingley law it was 90 cents per hundred; under the Payne law it is 65 cents per hundred feet on certain grades, 35 cents per hundred feet on others. Only the grades rated at 65 cents per hundred feet are actually imported, and the net result is a large advance over the former duty.

Nor can it be said that the reductions in Schedule C, the metal schedule, are productive on the whole of any real relief from inordinate taxation. It is true that there are numerous decreases in this schedule, including iron ore, pig iron, scrap iron, bar iron, cotton ties, steel rails, steel ingots, wire rope, and the like, but there are corresponding increases, including ferrosilicon, tungsten-bearing ores, certain classes of cutlery, notably razors, on which the tariff is raised from 28 to 68 per cent, structural steel, antimony, and so forth. As in the chemical schedule the articles reduced are largely those which could be made in this country in absolute immunity from competition abroad without any duties at all. The result is a net reduction in the whole metal schedule of less than 1 per cent, or from 32.13 ad valorem to 31.35. To show how immaterial are the changes in this schedule let me say that the expected revenue under the new rate is $21,400,000 in round numbers, while the actual revenue in 1907, under the old law, was $21,900,000, a difference of only $500,000.

The value of the articles of this schedule produced each year in the United States is over three billions of dollars. The imports under this schedule amounted to sixty-eight millions in 1907, the year adopted by the Republican majority of the Senate Finance Committee, in the official statement before described, as the typical fiscal year. Mark well the situation. In order to raise $21,400,000 of revenue the American people must pay a tribute of 31 cents in every dollar of the $3,000,000,000 worth of metal articles annually turned out in the United States, the steel trust being the principal beneficiary.

Schedule D, wood and its manufactures, presents a condition largely similar. While reductions are made in lumber, both rough and sawed, the total decrease in the entire schedule is only from 15.12 ad valorem under the Dingley law to 12.79 under the new measure. The reductions in this schedule, as well as the reductions in all other schedules, may be neutralized at any time by the operation of the maximum and minimum features of the law, with which I shall deal later. In the next two schedules, E and F, embracing sugar and tobacco, respectively, there are no changes, the rates continuing at the enormous figure of 65 per cent ad valorem for the former, 87 per cent for the latter. There is no lightening of the tariff burdens on these two fundamental necessities. Sugar manufactures total four hundred and thirteen millions a year in the United States; tobacco manufactures, three hundred and thirty millions. What a harvest for the sugar and tobacco trusts, which control the principal output!

Schedule G, agricultural products and provisions, shows on the whole a slight increase of duty. This schedule includes live animals, breadstuffs, dairy products, vegetables, nursery stock, seeds, fish, fruits, meat products, salt, starch, spices, and vinegar, and the average ad valorem charge remains in the neighborhood of 32 per cent. On spirits, wines, and other beverages, Schedule H, there is a general increase of about 20 per cent, and there is no objection to this. One of the chief outrages of the new Republican tariff is Schedule I, covering cotton manufactures. It contains provisions for added duties wherever cotton goods have been mercerized and wherever they can be separated into threads, which have the effect of doubling, tripling, and quadrupling the already high tariff rates on a vast class of common cotton stuffs. According to the official Republican estimate the duties in the cotton schedule were raised from an average ad valorem of 44.84 in the Dingley law to 50.62 in the Payne law. Cotton hosiery bears a tax ranging from 55 to 87 per cent under this new Republican tariff, cotton underwear a tax of from 50 to 60 per cent, while cotton ribbons and suspenders bear a tax of 45 per cent. Even the wicks of the candles that feebly light the poorest firesides are taxed nearly 50 per cent, while diamonds and pearls, in another section of the law, escape with a charge of only 10 per cent. The home manufactures of cotton have a value of a billion dollars a year, on which the American people must pay the equivalent of an average tariff charge of over 50 per cent to raise an estimated revenue on forty or fifty millions of imports of only sixteen millions.

In the flax, hemp, and jute schedule, Schedule J, there is a slight increase on the whole, the average ad valorem in both Dingley and Payne bills being in the neighborhood of 44 per cent, the one slightly below, the other slightly above it. In the woolen schedule, Schedule K, there are only four reductions, and they are unimportant, in the 20 paragraphs of the schedule covering hundreds of articles of universal use. If there was a schedule in the Dingley law which needed thorough overhauling it was this woolen schedule, with rates on blankets ranging from 107 to 165 per cent, on the cheaper flannels 140 per cent, dropping to 60 and 75 per cent for oriental rugs and velvet carpets, and keeping the main burden of taxation on the masses. This schedule remains practically unchanged, imposing the Dingley average ad valorem of nearly 60 per cent. Thus, to raise thirty-six millions of revenue on sixty-two millions of woolen imports, the American people are subjected to a tax of nearly 60 per cent on the seven hundred and sixty-seven millions of woolen goods manufactured annually in the United States. The silk schedule, Schedule L, remains substantially without change, retaining an average ad valorem of about 50 per cent. It is a typical Republican act to keep cottons and woolens, which are so necessary to the comfort and life of the masses, under as high a tax as silks, which only the more fortunate may wear; yea, to keep the cheaper grades of the former under a much higher impost than the latter.

In Schedule M, which relates to pulp, paper, and books, there is on the whole an increase of duty, a condition that shocks the Nation's moral sense. The extortions of the paper trust under the Dingley law aroused the newspapers of the country to angry and impatient protest. The Republican Congress appointed a special committee, headed by that vigorous and vigilant Republican, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to investigate the situation. After thorough investigation the committee recommended the free admission of wood pulp and the reduction of the duty on print paper from $6 to $2 per ton. The Payne law as finally enacted made mechanically ground wood pulp free, but added a discriminating duty of one-twelfth of a cent per pound against countries levying export duties or other charges. Chemical pulp, bleached and unbleached; print paper, surface-coated paper, and lithographic paper were nominally reduced, but the discriminating duties were supplied. On all forms of writing paper a distinct advance was made, the highest tax resting on the commonest kinds. The net result was an increase in the schedule as a whole, instead of a reduction as recommended by the Republican investigating committee, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in complete disgust, voted against the Payne bill on its final passage. The paper trust had scored a tremendous triumph. Late dispatches report that the price of Bibles has been raised on account of the new Republican tariff tax. How long will the American voter submit to a party which taxes without mercy the food of his table, the clothing of his family, and the Bible of his God? In the miscellaneous schedule, Schedule N, there is a net decrease, but not a sufficient decrease to lower the total average of the Payne law. Hides are placed on the free list, but the corresponding reduction on leather goods is not sufficient to bring about the needed relief.

Coal is reduced from 67 cents to 45 cents per ton; agricultural implements, from 20 to 15 per cent. Dolls and marbles and toys in general are still subjected to a heavy tariff. Thus the amusements of childhood are laid under tribute to protected greed. The reductions of this schedule as well as those of all the other schedules, I again assert, are by no means permanent on account of the maximum and minimum regulations embraced in section 2 of the new law.

This brief review will suffice to show the emptiness and the impudence of the assertion that the Payne law makes a material reduction of the enormous Dingley rates or is even a step in that direction. The labored efforts of Republican apologists, including the President himself, to show that the new Republican tariff law is a step toward lower tariffs are doing more to undermine the archaic dogma of protection than all other agencies combined. [Applause.] Once high tariffs were applauded; now they are disowned. Once the American people were told that the foreigner paid the tariff tax; now this argument is never seriously advanced. The inability of the Republican party to reduce the tariff taxes, the actual enlargement of tariff burdens in the Payne law, the growth and insolence of monopoly, the rise in price of articles of general use have awakened the people to a bitter sense of wrongs no longer to be endured. The American people can not sustain much longer the yearly burden of an average ad valorem of nearly 50 per cent on nearly all the fifteen billions of goods manufactured in the United States.

They are beginning to see that out of every dollar of the greater part of this fifteen billions which they expend every year for articles of necessity and comfort they receive only about 50 cents in actual value. It is little wonder that nine-tenths of the schools of political economy in the universities and colleges of the land condemn the Republican doctrine of protection. It is little wonder that the Republican President advocates higher postage rates on weekly newspapers and magazines. These periodicals are the torch bearers of intelligence in America; they reach and teach the firesides of the masses. They afford to the countless millions unable to buy a daily paper the only means of keeping in touch with the world's affairs. They are exposing the true nature of tariff and other governmental evils, and their circulation is a menace to the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] True to its traditional love of monopolistic wealth the Republican party, through its President, suggests this increase in postal charges on the cheaper periodicals, despite the fact that the railroads are being paid the most insufferable rates for mail transportation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We are now in position to consider the maximum and minimum feature of the Payne law. Let it be remembered that the Dingley law in section 4 established a basis for reciprocal trade relations by offering 20 per cent reductions on such of or all its articles in return for similar favors abroad. The Payne law establishes a new form of foreign-trade arrangements so different from section 4 of the Dingley law as to amount to a repudiation of the true principle of reciprocity.

The rates specified in the various schedules of the Payne tariff law constitute its minimum list, and it provides that an additional 25 per cent shall be levied on all its articles on and after March 31, 1910, as to countries not according us equal trade and tariff treatment with all others. Thus, our minimum rates are increased over 20 per cent, being higher than the maximum rates of the Dingley law. All existing commercial treaties are abrogated and other nations are abruptly told that they must accept our enormous minimum list, giving no preferences over us in any of their trade arrangements under pain of a further increase in our tariff of 25 per cent. It matters not that a foreign country may obtain concessions from other foreign countries far below the minimum rates of the Payne bill; the President is empowered to require that foreign country to accord us equal advantages with these others, although we may not give an equal consideration. The law is so worded that either the entire maximum list or the entire minimum list must be applied, regardless of the number or importance of the articles involved. It is a system unknown in international law, alike without precedent or equity, a challenge of all the earth to economic war. [Applause.]

But this is not all. Republicans, you confessed your skepticism as to the ability of your tariff law, with its almost prohibitive charges on the essentials of existence, to produce sufficient revenue; your failure as practical tariff legislators when in section 40 of the Payne measure you increased the authority of the Government to borrow money with Treasury certificates to two hundred millions. Moreover, you began a vicious practice by providing in the Payne law Panama Canal bonds to the extent of nearly three hundred millions in addition to the eighty-four millions already issued. A few years ago you told us the canal would cost one hundred and forty millions, now you tell us it will cost three hundred and seventy-five millions. What will it be next year?

You have introduced the fatal custom of capitalizing previous expenditures, a practice that has complicated the fiscal affairs of France and Germany almost beyond solution, a practice that may later be applied to army and navy and other expenditures. So you celebrated the passage of the crowning Republican tariff of five decades by preparing to borrow over $500,000,000. But there is more. By another stroke of your miserable statesmanship you authorized in the Payne Act a bond and certificate interest of 3 per cent, without readjusting the circulation taxes on national-bank notes. As 3 per cents pay only 1 per cent tax per annum, while 2 per cents, the present basis of circulation, pay 1½ per cent, the issue of the threes would cause a depreciation of the twos, upsetting the stability of the currency, and thus the very expedients you have devised are fraught with endless danger to the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In your fifty years of almost uninterrupted power you have driven the American merchant flag from the ocean highways. Under the moderate tariffs of Democracy the American merchant flag floated on every sea, emblemizing our supremacy in the world's carrying trade. Now it has all but vanished from the oceans, being rarely seen in foreign ports. When you assumed national control in 1860 American ships had been carrying the greater part of our own trade and the trade of the world. Last year, of the two and three-quarter billions of American exports and imports less than 10 per cent was carried in American ships. Several of the great foreign steamship companies have each to-day a greater tonnage than all our merchant ships in the foreign trade. You now attempt to restore what you have destroyed by suggesting subsidies from the Treasury. You forget that liberal trade relations with all the world based on livable tariff rates at home and modern navigation laws are the only means by which an adequate merchant tonnage may be restored. Your exorbitant tariffs have so angered foreign peoples and so prejudiced foreign markets that our share in the world's trade is comparatively insignificant.

And yet we are foremost among the nations in natural wealth and resource! We sell comparatively little to most of the other nations, because our enormous tariffs forbid them to sell freely to us. Of the more than one billion of imports entering France in 1908 we sent less than 11 per cent; of the more than one billion entering the Netherlands, less than 11 per cent; of the more than two billions entering Germany, only 15 per cent; of the four hundred and twelve millions entering Russia, less than 6 per cent; of the five hundred and seven millions entering Austria-Hungary, less than 10 per cent; of the seven hundred and seven millions entering Belgium, less than 9 per cent; of the three hundred and thirteen millions entering Switzerland, less than 5 per cent; of the sixteen billions entering all the nations of the earth, about 14½ per cent. Of all the imports going to the entire continent of South America we furnish less than 5 per cent; of those going to the entire continent of Asia, less than 6 per cent; of those going to Oceania, less than 3 per cent; of those going to Africa, less than 2 per cent.

You have established an era of intense materialism. Your tariffs have fashioned an age of monopoly and millionaires, an age with arms of steel, ideals of brass, and heart of stone; an age in which material success has become the dominating aspiration of society. You have established an idolatry of the rich, a modern paganism more revolting than all the superstitions of antiquity. You have builded the modern trust, surpassing in wealth and power the wildest conjectures of the past. The millionaire has supplanted the statesman, the divine, the judge, in the regard of men; the dollar mark has eclipsed the cross. [Applause on Democratic side.] Patten in the wheat pit at Chicago, pale and breathless while millions accumulate and the price of bread grows dearer; Morgan restoring the trembling edifice of finance, while the mere fact that he takes a cup of coffee at 2 o'clock in the morning is cabled to the remotest sections of the earth; Rockefeller fixing the price of one of life's necessities, in this morbid hour an object of such world interest that the appearance of a single hair on his desolate cranium would be given a column in the Associated Press [laughter], are truer types of Republican ideals and tendencies than Jefferson composing the gospel of a nation's liberties or Washington declining an empire to resume the quiet labors of the farm. [Loud applause.]

But there are indications everywhere of an awakening that portends immediate political revolution. The American people are rapidly returning to the Democracy, the party that applies to the tariff, as to all other problems, the spirit of equality, the spirit that made the founder of the Democratic party the author of the Declaration of American Independence. They will restore to its ancient supremacy the party of human brotherhood, whose survival of the defeats of fifty years is the highest evidence of the purity of its principles, the justice of its cause. It is the only American party that has ever made a real revision of the tariff. It emerges to-day from the national reverse of 1908 to inspire hope among its followers and terror among its foes. Soon its banners will float in triumph above a people united and redeemed, and 80,000,000 tongues will shout "Democracy forever!" [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH].

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few remarks while the House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

On May 3, 1909, there was submitted in this House a resolution of inquiry directed to the Secretary of the Navy, requesting information as to a proposed gift of silver service for use on board of the United States battle ship Mississippi, the chief decoration of which was understood to be a portrait engraving of Jefferson Davis, late chief of the defunct southern confederacy. It sought to inquire into the propriety and authority for the act and contemplated corrective legislation. That its exact nature and scope may be readily understood, it is here quoted in full:

Whereas the dignity and character of the United States Government and its creditable standing at home and abroad require that its battle ships should be in command of officers imbued with high American ideals, healthy loyalty, and a just pride in the history and institutions of the Government they serve; and

Whereas public monuments, paintings, engravings, and other works of art exhibited or used in government buildings, structures, or in other public places belonging to the General Government are intended and should be calculated to inspire reverence for such ideals and teach valuable lessons of patriotism and love of country; and

Whereas it is reported in the public press and not contradicted that an elaborate silver service set of 62 pieces, with the centerpiece thereof decorated by an artistic portrait engraving of Jefferson Davis, the head of the late southern confederacy, has been purchased for presentation to the battle ship Mississippi for the permanent use of its officers at social and public functions, to the exclusion of any other service which might be furnished by the Government or presented by other donors; and

Whereas of the 37 officers now in command of the vessel, including Capt. John C. Fremont, of California, a worthy descendant of a brave Union general in the civil war, only 7 were appointed from the States lately adhering to the confederacy, and such proportion of appointments from the different States of the Union is likely to be continued in the future: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to inform the Congress by whom and on what authority such gift is to be accepted, and what lesson of loyalty or patriotism such portrait engraving is intended to teach, and with what ideals of government it is expected thereby to inspire the officers and men now or hereafter to be in control of such battle ship, and especially to ascertain and inform the Congress whether or not the proposed gift of silver service thus decorated and such use of it are agreeable to or desired by the officers now in command of the Mississippi.

As will be seen, the resolution does not contain an offensive word or reference of any kind. It is in line with the loyal sentiment of the country and the policy of the Government ever since the close of the civil war to carefully exclude from government buildings and grounds everything that might tend to offend or wound the feelings of our southern brethren, especially unpleasant reminders of their attempt in 1861 to disrupt the Union and destroy the Government established by George Washington and his compatriots.

The sons of the confederacy, thanks to this considerate thoughtfulness on the part of the General Government, may pass through the full courses at West Point and Annapolis without seeing on the walls or in the corridors of the buildings any picture or motto calculated to remind them of the fact that their fathers at one time deserted the old flag under which they serve as cadets. A confederate reunion might be held here in this Capitol building, and not a soldier of the "lost cause" be reminded, by picture, cut, or carving, of Vicksburg or Appomattox. He would see in the Rotunda a magnificent painting of the surrender of Cornwallis, but nothing of the fate of Pemberton or Lee. He would see representations of glorious victories won by American arms in Mexico and against foreign foes on other battlefields, but nothing of Lookout Mountain, Sherman's march to the sea, or the capture of Richmond. No arc de triumph has ever been permitted to span any of the magnificent avenues of the Nation's capital.

The dominant element of the Government—loyal people of the North, if you please—have ever been thoughtful and considerate of the vanquished, those who failed in their ill-advised, ill-timed, and ill-starred effort to destroy by arms the best government God ever gave to man. The right hand of friendship and forgetfulness, ever since the tragic furling of the stars and bars at Appomattox, has been generously extended by the victors. It is not their fault if a want of fraternal feeling exists anywhere within the Nation's domain.

The passing years have done their perfect work on both sides in healing the wounds of the civil war. Generously has the line between the Blue and the Gray been obliterated except in matters of vital principle. Equality of citizenship under the law has been made absolute without humiliating conditions. The Government and the people have closed their eyes to the constitutional definition of treason.

Only one man, Jefferson Davis, of all the confederacy spurned the Government's generous proffer to restore forfeited citizenship. After the collapse of his hopes of a southern empire, he seemed to live and die literally as "the man without a country."

Quoting from a eulogy by his chief lieutenant, Gen. John B. Gordon:

> Mr. Davis for the last quarter century of his life was the citizen of no country, professed allegiance to no government, was not concerned in the duties or ambitious for the rewards which make the life of an ordinary man.

Peace, blessed peace, and forgetfulness seemed to spread her wings alike over North and South after the surrender and parole of the armed forces of the confederacy, and, with rare exceptions as in the case of Mr. Davis, it was fondly hoped that the confederacy itself and all that it stood for in opposition to the General Government might in time be forgotten, might pass away like a horrid dream of the night.

But, sad commentary on American patriotism, this hope has not been realized. On the contrary, the false ideals of the confederacy would seem from recent events to have been only temporarily laid aside, incased as it were in chrysalis form, cocoon-like, in furled confederate flags, only to burst forth in new forms as soon as the General Government and the loyal, forgiving people of the North could again be lulled into a feeling of security, brotherly love, and indifference.

Has this condition arrived? Are there no longer any cherished ideals of the Northland? Has maudlin sentimentality replaced heroic conviction? Does the recent chiseling of the name of Jefferson Davis immediately above that of Abraham Lincoln on Cabin John Bridge, at Washington, indicate a mistaken belief in the waning glory and fame of Lincoln or a wish for the recrudescence of his confederate rival?

The portent of the times would seem to indicate a belief in the minds of southern statesmen that the ideals of Lincoln and Grant, the eternal principles of right vindicated in a four years' war for the Union, are being forgotten, or at least lost sight of in the present mad, feverish, money-getting commercial age. There is no other explanation of recent events. The erection of a monument to Major Wirz, of Andersonville fame; the forcing into the National Hall of Fame a statue of a confederate general in the full uniform he wore while fighting to destroy the Government; the attempted decorating of an American battle ship with engraved object lessons calculated to teach young officers reverence for the false ideals of the confederacy, and the congressional attacks now pending in Congress, one in the Senate and one in the House, to nullify and destroy both the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, guaranties on which rest many of the vital results of the civil war, only tell a part of the story.

In unguarded moments the hidden thoughts and purposes of a people come to light. Note the sudden outburst of violent invective at the unexpected introduction of the resolution in question at the late special session of Congress. Simple, plain, and inoffensive as were its terms, it was at once attacked and, with its almost unknown author, made the object of merciless abuse and misrepresentation. All the deep-seated rancor and prejudice of the old days of the southern slavocracy, when northern men were called "mud sills" and Union soldiers were contemptuously referred to as "Lincoln hirelings," seemed to break forth with increased violence on a mere suggestion that United States battle ships are not the proper place for the display of confederate emblems, and that the young officers of the American Navy are entitled to different object lessons and different incentives to duty than the engraved portraits of confederate chiefs.

The storm raged with bitter fury in the press of the South, especially in that of Mississippi. The United States mails from that section were burdened with threats of violence against the hapless author of the resolution. Even here in the national capital there was a suggestive feeling that possibly a mite of the old spirit of Preston Brooks and others, who were wont to strike down officials for opinion's sake, might be lingering in the halls or underground recesses of the Capitol building.

It was a sudden awakening for the people of the North, who had fondly cherished the belief that Grant's magnanimity at Appomattox was still remembered and appreciated in the South.

So violent and abusive was this attack in a personal sense that, on May 15, at the extra session, I rose in the House to a question of privilege, and, ignoring the low, scurrilous abuse of irresponsible letter writers and small newspapers, asked to reply to certain articles in four of the leading southern journals, one of them published at the capital of the State of Mississippi, styling itself the "official journal of Mississippi."

I believed then, and I believe yet, that I was entitled under the rules to the privilege. But it was denied after the articles had been read in full by the Clerk. They are printed in the RECORD of that date.

To make the situation plain, however, I here quote from them a number of personal excerpts:

> This man HOLLINGSWORTH is serving his first term in Congress, and is evidently a South hater of the rankest kind, who is seeking to make political capital for the future.

> Raised in a section notorious for its hatred of the South, of southern men and southern institutions, in a restricted and narrow sphere, and with no public experience, and taught to believe that Jefferson Davis was a traitor who should have been tried, convicted, and hung, it is perhaps natural that such a contemptible little whelp should rise up to abuse the men and slander the section that appreciates him. HOLLINGSWORTH belongs to the past, though a young man, to that class of narrow-minded political wretches who think it a virtue to wave the "bloody shirt" and an honor to denounce the South's great chieftain.

> It is all nonsense for this little Ohio Congressman to talk about the proposed gift being agreeable to the officers, or to ask by whom and on what authority such gift is to be accepted. The Navy Department has known for months what the design would be, and no word of displeasure has been received, no suggestion as to change made, so it is safe to say that no attention will be paid to the cheap resolution of the political nonentity from Ohio.

> The Ohio Congressman who got up in the House the other day and raised all manner of sand about the picture of Jefferson Davis being put on the silver service presented to the battle ship Mississippi ought to be informed that nobody cares what he thinks about it. A politically prejudiced gas bag from Ohio can no more cast reflection upon the life and character of Jefferson Davis than a mangy, flea-bitten, bobtailed cur dog can insult the moon by getting up at 2 o'clock in the morning and barking himself to death at the pale-faced luminary.

> Had Congressman HOLLINGSWORTH been informed, as he should have been, he would have known that whatever are the designs and ornaments and figures and emblems on this silverware were selected by a commission of men named by the State; that the money for this service was contributed by citizens of Mississippi; and that nothing has been done without the approval of the Secretary of the Navy at Washington.

> Measured by his frothings, he is indeed a little man. If aged enough to have enlisted in the struggle between the States he was not one of the brave men who were actively engaged in active service and on the fighting line. Brave men, men who experienced the hardships of the march, the camp, the bivouac, and the shock of battle do not "wave the bloody shirt." Perhaps Congressman HOLLINGSWORTH was one of the "home guards" or one of Sherman's bums, who robbed defenseless women, old men, and children. Who is HOLLINGSWORTH? Has he ever "fit and bled and died" for his country?

> The man who holds the position of Secretary of War to-day in the Cabinet of President Taft believes in Jefferson Davis. And if Davis deserves the contempt and execration that this pusillanimous pigmy from Ohio would heap upon his name, the son of a confederate soldier, who believes in his father's political creed, has no place in the Cabinet of Mr. Taft.

These quotations, Mr. Chairman, fairly represent, in my judgment, the real feeling and spirit in ex-confederate circles toward those in the North who are unwilling to shut their eyes to the manifest and growing recrudescence of the confederacy in thought and power here at the national capital.

I am not alone entitled to the distinction.

On attempting respectfully to reply after the articles were read I was met by technical objections from at least five honorable Members representing States lately adhering to the southern confederacy, and two from New York—seven in all; and, on their objections, it was held that such accusations, sufficient, if true, to warrant expulsion, did not "reflect upon the gentleman from Ohio in his representative capacity" and were not, therefore, subject to a question of privilege; that is to say, it is not officially regarded as a reflection upon the representative character of a Member of the House, barring personal epithets, to accuse him of being a misfit Congressman, introducing cheap resolutions, and raising all manner of sand in the House to make political capital for the future. A graver or more contemptible charge against the actions or motives of a Member or against his official integrity could not, in my humble judgment, be made. If guilty, he should be expelled. It seemed to me unfair, but it was effective. I was knocked out, in the language of the prize ring, before I got on my gloves.

Unanimous consent, a request seldom denied to a Member, was asked to have my remarks printed in the RECORD, explaining my position and the resolution I had offered, but again objections from the same source came prompt and vigorous.

I was squelched; I felt like a "steam roller" had unexpectedly passed over me as the gavel fell, ending my efforts.

The result? My own discomfiture shall not weigh a feather with me in the calculation. It was not the first time I had witnessed an apparent confederate victory.

But, sinking my own personality entirely, I ask again, What of the results?

The press and public men of the South seemed to accept and hail the incident as a complete vindication in the Congress of the United States of the principles for which the confederacy stood. Exultant echoes of this sentiment were heard at every confederate reunion from the Potomac to the Gulf, and even here in the National Capital it was as plainly manifested in certain quarters as was the joy which showed itself in many faces immediately following the first battle of Manassas Junction. The quoted newspaper articles claimed to have been thus approved were read and reread with gleeful comment. Literally, a broad smile spread over the Southland at my discomfiture.

And why not, my countrymen? They stand to-day unchallenged on the records of this Congress. They contain sentiments abhorrent to the calm, conservative, just judgment of the people whose loyalty under Lincoln saved this Government from destruction, and yet no reply was permitted.

Let me quote a few other excerpts not of a personal nature:

> Everybody in America who knows the history of the two men knows that in point of education, native ability, culture, oratory, legal attainments, character, and unselfish patriotism, that Jefferson Davis was a greater man than Abraham Lincoln, and knows, furthermore, that the cause for which the southern soldiers fought was the cause of right.
>
> * * * * * * * *
> In revering the memory of Jefferson Davis the State of Mississippi has honored itself and exalted the patriotism of her gallant sons and the devotion and heroism of her daughters.
>
> The people of Mississippi have contributed the money to buy the silver service for the battle ship Mississippi, bearing the name of their State. And the people who contributed believe in the purity and nobility of the life of Jefferson Davis. They sympathized with him during the war between the States. They honor his memory and admire beyond expression his superb qualities.
> If the portrait was not on the silver service, I should have it put on the service, and I would put it in such a conspicuous place that it would be impossible to look at the service without seeing the best likeness possible of the incomparable man who served as president of the confederacy.

These expressions, Mr. Chairman, are not the words of irresponsible passion-led men of the South. They were not written in 1860 and 1861, when turbulent hot-heads, South and North, if you please, were rushing the American people into a clash of arms. They were not inspired in the heat of the conflict as it raged from Manassas Junction to Appomattox. They were written deliberately in 1909 by representative men of the so-called "New South," and reveal a present purpose and determination not to let "by-gones be by-gones," not to stand by the honorable settlements made between the brave officers and men who fought to a finish the most unfortunate war ever known in history.

Silently and insidiously, night and day, in the schools, churches, and other organizations for the control of public sentiment in the South, even here in the halls of Congress, the leaven of distrust and discontent seems to be constantly working. The senseless cry of the "bloody shirt" is still heard repeated and rerepeated as a complaint, although sensible people long ago recognized it as a mere ruse to conceal southern hopes and designs.

Southern ideals are being revived; southern idols are being recanonized. What, I ask, does this mean? Are the results of the civil war to be undermined and destroyed? If not, why the pending resolutions in this Congress to nullify the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments? Why the scores and hundreds of bills introduced, forty-four years after the civil war, to pay for alleged damages in the Confederate States caused by the Union armies in the necessary prosecution of the war? Why all this commotion about a simple protest against making our battle ships places for the display of confederate emblems? Why the reported raising of a large fund to erect a confederate memorial at Arlington, eclipsing in size and magnificence any of the present monuments, if its purpose be not to establish a rival center for the annual display of confederate sentiment at a place peculiarly sacred to the memory of Union soldiers who lie buried there in such numbers that they and their widows and orphans have been rudely referred to as the greatest of all monuments to confederate valor and confederate honor? Why the recent demand that antislavery mottoes be removed from the walls of the Lee mansion by executive order?

The truth ought to be known. If the State of Mississippi, merely because the Navy Department has chosen to name one of its battle ships after the State, may force upon it for use anything offensive to the general sentiment of the country, the sooner that fact is made known the better. If one State may do this, another may. If the portrait engraving of Jefferson Davis be a proper object lesson on board the Mississippi, then that of Brigham Young would be equally appropriate on the recently launched battle ship Utah. Either suggestion would make of the vessel a laughingstock in any foreign port in Christendom.

I do not disguise, Mr. Chairman, the ultimate purpose of my resolution to be a law to prohibit such objectionable displays on all American vessels and public buildings. They should be forbidden just as the law now forbids the official acceptance of foreign gifts.

Abuse of the author and sarcastic references to his motives, the usual resort of small minds in the absence of substantial arguments, can not reduce or minimize the subject. It will not down.

I waited patiently during the extra session in the hope that opportunity might come to bring up my resolution, but I was disappointed.

Meantime conditions changed somewhat after June 1, the date heralded in advance for the ostentatious delivery of the silver service on board the vessel with characteristic pomp and blandishment, there to be accepted in like spirit by Captain Frémont, son of a Union general and first Republican candidate for the Presidency. It was impossible to learn from the public press whether the Davis silver had actually been taken on board. An opossum-like reticence seemed to settle upon these same southern journals after the 1st of June. The last published trace of the precious gift, so far as I know, shows it on shore in the hands of some of Mr. Davis's friends and a subaltern of the vessel, all seemingly making merry over what they evidently believed to be the indifferent attitude of Congress and the Navy Department of the United States Government.

I thereupon, in the closing days of the extra session, finding it impossible to secure consideration, introduced another resolution, to be taken up at the regular session, and which embodied all the terms of the former one, with this addition:

> Whereas under the present rules of the House as administered it has so far been impossible to get such resolution up in the House for consideration, and it has been reported in the public press that a subaltern officer of the vessel while on shore June 1, 1909, assumed to accept such gift from some of Mr. Davis's friends on behalf of the Navy Department of the United States Government: Therefore
> Resolved, That in addition to the requests for information set forth in the original resolution above the Secretary of the Navy be also requested to inform the Congress whether or not such a gift has been accepted by any one; and if so, how, by whom, and on what authority.

I again call attention, Mr. Chairman, to the total absence of any offensive words in the resolution. It seeks only information on which to base future legislation.

I may be pardoned, therefore, for a brief reply to the harsh invectives which my resolution excited. "The war is supposed to be over," says this official journal of Mississippi, coupled with a personal reference intended to be offensive. I agree with it in this sentiment. The tragedy of Appomattox, forty-odd years ago, was supposed to end a great civil war, a war between the States, a sort of War of the Roses, as some modern statesmen insist on calling it.

Ulysses S. Grant, the great captain of the Union forces, when he said "Let us have peace," meant it from the bottom of his big loyal heart, and every true soldier of the North responded "Amen! so let it be." They had learned to respect southern valor and southern courage.

They have kept the faith; loyally have they abided by the pact of peace made by Grant and Lee. Conscious of the rectitude of their own hearts and the justice of their own cause, northern soldiers have been content with the simple fruits of victory and have not in any manner sought the personal humiliation of the equally brave soldiers of the lost cause.

I also agree with another sentiment of my editorial critic, applying it to the soldiers of both armies, that "brave men, men who experienced the hardships of the march, the camp, and the bivouac, and the shock of battle, do not wave the 'bloody shirt;'" a fact, Mr. Chairman, easily learned at any reunion of either the Blue or the Gray, especially at such confederate reunions as the one held last summer at Memphis. The veterans of Lee and Jackson and Johnston present on that occasion did not need to afterwards explain or apologize for anything they said or did. They were not there to fight over again the battles of the war or exploit their own acknowledged bravery. They were not disturbed by the excited expressions of a few tame civilians ostentatiously wearing confederate emblems and waving confederate flags in a time of profound peace.

When Robert E. Lee, of Virginia, Grant's famous rival, the real idol of the Southland, with calm dignity and a nobility of soul born of his own belief in the righteousness of his cause, feeling that his personal honor was untouched, but recognizing the inevitable, bowed his head in sorrow and handed his sword to General Grant in token of capitulation and his acceptance of terms the most generous ever offered by a victor on the field of battle, he acted in good faith, intending thereby the full significance of his action. When he said, in anguish of heart, to his devoted followers, "Boys, the war is over," he meant it, and they, too, like their comrades in the North, responded in fitting approval. They also have kept the faith.

Lee did not by hysteric efforts seek personal safety in flight. He gave no cause for scandal or false accusation. He was not captured in hiding or in disguise.

It had been a contest of giants. Anglo-Saxon had contended against Anglo-Saxon and cavalier for the triumph of ideas. There was no middle-ground for compromise. God himself had drawn the line, and surrender meant abandonment of the cherished ideals of a lost cause. Deeply touched by Grant's magnanimity and in a spirit of heroic resignation, Lee bade his brave band of survivors farewell, and they, in turn, with deep feeling and affection, accepted his advice and returned to their homes, henceforth to live the life of good citizenship.

They abided by the results of the war and have kept the pact of peace. This action of Grant and Lee and their respective commands is an object lesson, a benediction, an inspiration, and an example for all time to those who place God and country above passion and prejudice. It is an object lesson in historic setting, dwarfing in comparison into infinitesimal proportions the action of the State of Mississippi in its recent attempt to revive war memories by forcing upon an American man-of-war, where only loyal thoughts should be taught or tolerated, an object lesson for young officers such as the engraved portrait of the chief of the forces lately confederated against the Government.

Nor can I, Mr. Chairman, pass by without resenting it, another suggestion of one of those quoted articles to the effect that the Union Army of General Sherman was an army of "bums who robbed defenseless women, old men, and children." I was not with General Sherman on his famous march to the sea, but I knew him personally and knew enough of the character of his subordinate officers and men to denounce this sentiment as an atrocious libel. Man for man, officer for officer, no more creditable army ever marched to battle under a civilized flag.

My own part in the great war drama of the sixties was an unimportant and modest one. A year or more of service as a private in the Twenty-fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry did not furnish many opportunities for distinction or for doing harm to the confederacy, but, simple and uneventful as it was, I am proud of it and have no apologies to make.

One or two little incidents of my service ought perhaps to shield me from the embittered pens of writers who, from the safe vantage of editorial sanctums, charge me with being a "South hater of the rankest kind," "narrow-minded political wretch," "waver of the 'bloody shirt,'" "home guard," or "one of Sherman's bums," and so forth.

Allow me to recite one of these incidents, not only in answer to the ill-tempered inquiry as to where I "fit, bled, and died for my country," but as showing that there never was any real animosity or hatred existing between the men behind the guns, such as now seems to inspire certain fire-eating editors and reunion orators who were either too young or too feeble to do any of the fighting, but who now delight in hurling hot explosions of wrath at imaginary foes, forgetting that their efforts would be laughable if it were not for their serious effect on the minds of women and children. Don Quixote attacking his windmill was not more ludicrous.

But to the incident I was about to relate.

I hold in my hand a little keepsake given me by a confederate prisoner captured in one of the minor engagements of the war. It is a fractional bill of one dollar and a half, issued August 1, 1861, by the Metropolitan Savings Bank, Richmond, and payable in current funds of the kind then in use in the Southern States. It is a curiosity to-day, but its value and significance to me, then and now, are shown by a memorandum of facts entered by me on its back after my return to camp. It follows:

This note was given to me December 13, 1861, on the battlefield of Alleghany Summit, Virginia, by a confederate soldier whom I personally captured. He belonged to a Georgia regiment. I shot at him once before he surrendered. After throwing down his gun and giving up, he remarked that he was nearly starved, and I gave him enough for a good square meal out of the cooked rations in my haversack before turning him over to the prisoners' guard. He thanked me very cordially, said the "Yanks" were not such bad people after all, and asked that I accept the note as a keepsake. I felt a boyish pride in having captured a full-grown rebel when I was only 17 years and 22 days old. (DAVID A. HOLLINGSWORTH, Company B, Twenty-fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.)

God bless that particular son of the South. I am glad my shot went wild of its mark. I called him a "rebel" then and he called me a "Yank," in the common language of the time; but I shared with him my "flitch and hard-tack," and if he is still living and will visit me at Washington, I shall be glad to entertain him with the best meal the Capitol café can afford.

Such incident is mentioned, not in self-praise, but in self-defense, against the poisoned arrows incessantly winged at me from all sections of the South.

The Navy Department is also charged with complicity, or rather with knowledge, for months, without objection, of the intention of the State of Mississippi to present this portrait engraving for use on the United States battle ship of the same name. I doubt this statement. It may be true, but I call for specific proof or, in default, that an apology be made to the loyal sentiment of the country.

If true, the American people are entitled to know the fact.

I do not believe in perpetuating the hatreds of the war, North or South. Time has softened its asperities and smoothed out its wrinkles. No one to-day objects to the Southland honoring its heroes at home in its own way. Southern statesmen can truthfully boast that they decorate their homes with confederate flags and the pictures of Davis, Lee, and Jackson, without offense to northern visitors of highest distinction, and without injury to their political standing. No official, certainly in the North, thinks of encroaching upon individual rights. In all the history of civil wars the world over there is not a parallel to the leniency, high consideration in fact, shown by the General Government toward those who, less than a half century ago, were striking at the life of this great Nation.

As a contrast, Mr. Chairman, I noticed on a recent visit to the old confederate capitol at Richmond that the captured confederate flags which, instead of having been destroyed as they properly might have been at the close of the war, were kept and eventually returned to the several States, and those of Virginia are now displayed in glass cases in the most conspicuous corridor of the capitol building, object lessons again teaching the rising generation to revere the false doctrines of the lost cause.

The same conditions doubtless exist at other southern capitals.

It was this false educational use of such flags, foreseen twenty-odd years ago by Governor Foraker of Ohio, which called forth his fiery but notable response when asked to join in the sentimental movement for their return, that no such flags would be returned from his State while he was governor, and subsequent events, Mr. Chairman, have vindicated his wisdom and forethought.

Indulgence and sympathy for the South have marked every national administration from Lincoln to Taft. Generously have they accorded to the South every right. Willingly have southern statesmen been called into the councils of the Nation, at times seemingly to the disparagement of those who stood by the General Government when loyalty meant something in this country.

The internal policy of the Southland has been sacredly regarded.

Even though shocked to the point of resistance by the recent erection of a monument on the horrible dead line at Andersonville to Maj. Henry Wirz, a foreign-born confederate adjudged responsible for the admitted atrocities there enacted during the war, the rising tide of public indignation at the National Capital and in the Northern States has been restrained. No action has been taken against such desecration. No dynamite has been applied. No congressional resolution has been introduced.

There has been marvelous toleration, not interference or restraint, for all southern ideals and tastes. Even recently, since the close of the extra session, there has been placed in Statuary Hall of this Capitol a confederate memorial which is a distinct shock to many loyal hearts throughout the country, but inasmuch as it is supposed to be lawful under an old statute of permission to the several States it will doubtless be tolerated until the law can be repealed, as it should be, and all state memorials be sent back to the respective States, where they belong. But, with due deference to the South and to all southern sympathizers, I protest that the limit has been reached in the proposed action of the State of Mississippi, claimed as a right, but without any law therefor, to decorate one of our national battle ships with objectionable emblems—"trophies," so called, of the confederacy; object lessons, if you please—calculated to inspire in young officers want of respect for the high ideals and history of the Government, simply because such battle ship happens to bear the same name as the adopted State of Jefferson Davis. As well demand on behalf of the State that "Old Glory" be hauled down and the "stars and bars" be run up to the masthead. It is the same spirit which seeks further, notwithstanding Mr. Davis's boasted refusal of American citizenship, to place an honorary memorial to his memory in Statuary Hall of the National Capitol, a place supposed to be reserved for the most honored citizenship of the Republic.

Shades of Lincoln, Seward, Sumner, Chase, Grant, and their illustrious compeers, what next? What next?

Some things, Mr. Chairman, like the war itself, were supposed to have been settled at Appomattox. They were subsequently embodied in constitutional amendments of which all right-thinking Americans are to-day jealous and watchful. They are as sacred as our form of government. They constitute the fundamental truths for which free men have contended in all ages. They lie at the very foundation of republican government. Any attack upon them is an attack upon free institutions.

Human slavery, although shot to death by Union guns, was not effectually destroyed until the adoption of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Citizenship and the equal protection of all citizens under the law came only with the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, now sought to be nullified by a resolution offered at the extra session and still pending in the Senate. Its guaranties are universal. Individual independence is secured by it in all matters of private concern. No citizen under it can be questioned for individual conscience; individual action, lawful in itself, can not be restrained. Racial lines, it is true, in matters of public right, are obliterated, but in private life, in individual association and choice, the individual is and always must remain, so to speak, the architect of his own fortune. No man, not even the President, can be questioned or called to account officially because of his friends, his associations, or those with whom he may wish to break bread.

Political equality does not mean social opportunity.

The fourteenth amendment also wisely forbids payment of the confederate debt and claims for emancipated slaves. Its repeal therefore as proposed would make such payments possible by a simple act of Congress.

Are we ready for this?

The fifteenth amendment, guaranteeing equal suffrage to all citizens, was a culmination only of political rights. It also should be enforced in spirit and in letter. The resolution to repeal it, offered July 9 and still pending in this House, must be regarded as revolutionary. It should be defeated.

I protest, therefore, in the name of constitutional government, in the name of a just people, against all modern attempts to nullify these great settlements of the war period, and especially against the open efforts now being made in certain quarters to teach false doctrines and false ideals to the rising generation by such object lessons as the ostentatious display of confederate memorials in the hall of fame at the National Capitol, or by the decoration of our United States war vessels with the emblems of a defeated and defunct confederacy.

Let the pact of Grant and Lee at Appomattox be kept inviolate in spirit and in fact. It is the only safety of our redeemed Republic. Anything else means the complete domination of the General Government, either by the North and northern ideas or by the South and southern ideas, possibly by both at different times, but the changes always attended by bitter political animosity and strife, such as led to the fiery outbreak of 1861. Americans all, let us as patriots faithfully observe every duty of good citizenship, and avoid all such acts and displays as tend to weaken the harmony and peace of the sections.

Let us honor but one flag on all occasions, and that the starry flag of our great Republic, destined as it is, under Providence, to lead the world upward to a higher, purer, nobler, grander civilization, a civilization in which the individual rights of man shall never again be questioned.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in behalf of the rural carrier. I very much regret that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads have not seen fit to give them some relief. I am somewhat familiar with the conditions of the rural carrier in my part of the country, and I am fully convinced that they do not receive adequate pay for their services. Rural Free Delivery News, a paper published in the interest of the rural carriers, sent me some statements of expenses which it received from rural carriers in my district. I presume that other Members of the House, perhaps all Members of the House, received the same information from the same source.

I have 25 itemized statements sent me by this publication, which came direct from the carriers to the paper, and which I have taken pains to tabulate, and which, I think, give a very definite idea of the cost to the rural carrier of maintaining his outfit. I desire to read to the House just a few figures showing the cost of maintaining the outfit of the rural carrier.

This statement itemizes the expenses under the heads of grain and hay purchased for the use of their teams, blacksmithing, veterinary service, repairs on wagon and harness, and loss of horses by death. The average cost of grain to the rural carrier in six months ending December 31, 1909, was $77.35. The average cost to these 25 carriers for hay for their teams during that six months was $65.60. The average cost for blacksmithing was $16.17. The average cost for veterinary service was $3.25. The average cost for repairs to vehicles and harness was $10.12. Average loss to the carriers for the loss of horses by death was $24.12, making a total of $196.61 to each carrier for the cost of maintaining his equipment in these particulars during the six months.

The statement shows that the average money invested by the carriers in their outfit is $438 each. They should be allowed something for the depreciation of the value of horses, vehicles, and harness. I should think 20 per cent would be a fair estimate of loss by depreciation in the value of their equipment, but I have computed it at 15 per cent, so that the loss by depreciation as an additional item for maintaining the outfit would amount to $32.85 for the six months. Six per cent interest on the investment is $13.14, making a total cost to each carrier for the maintenance of his outfit of $248.60.

His salary for six months was $450, leaving a net salary to the carrier for the six months of $201.40, or $33.50 a month.

Now, I do not think this average, as it is computed from this statement, is a high average. There may be some items which seem to be high, but in many instances in my part of the country some carriers feel that they are bound to maintain three horses. Most of them, however, maintain two, and I undertake to say that the cost of $248.60 to each carrier for maintaining his outfit is a very fair and reasonable estimate of the actual cost to the carrier.

Now, a salary of $33.50 per month is a very small salary. I do not know of any man engaged in any service, in or out of the Government, who makes as small an amount of money as that—a little more than $1.10 a day for the support of his family; a little less than $1.25 a day for the days actually worked.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord substantially with the gentleman. The rural carriers should be paid more than they get now. I am seeking to accomplish the same results that I presume the gentleman is seeking to accomplish. Can the gentleman tell me about how many pounds of mail matter, on an average, these rural carriers deliver?

Mr. STERLING. No; I can not. I have not any information on that point.

Mr. SULZER. Well, I understand it is about 25 pounds a trip. Not a very heavy load for a horse to carry. I am in favor of a parcels post, and I ask the gentleman if he does not think it would be a good idea if we had a parcels post, like other countries? The money that the Government would necessarily make by reason of a parcels post, in my opinion, would provide ample funds not only to pay the rural carriers good wages, but also to pay the post-office clerks good wages and to pay the letter carriers good wages. That is the policy we should adopt. I would like to know if my friend has looked into the advantages of a parcels post in connection with the Post-Office Department?

Mr. STERLING. No; I have not. I have given parcels post but very little consideration. I have reached this conclusion, however, so far as I have considered it—that if the Government undertakes to carry parcels on the same basis that it carries magazines and mail matter of that kind, there would not be very much profit in it for the Government and not much inducement for the Government to pay the carriers any higher salaries. It is not an answer to the demand for higher wages to the carrier to say that that service is losing money to the Government. They should not stand the burden. The Government demands that work done, and it ought to be willing to pay a fair and reasonable compensation for the service. Any day laborer anywhere in the country can get at least $2 a day for his services, with no money invested in an equipment or outfit, and no expense. He, with his hands alone, can earn anywhere in the country, I say, from two to two and a half dollars a day. Carpenters get $3.50 and $4 a day, and I know of no person, no class of persons, anywhere in the government service who get so little as $33.50 per month.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the gentleman has underestimated rather than overestimated the amount they get? I have received similar statements to the statement which the gentleman has suggested receiving from his district. The statements which I have received come a long distance from those which the gentleman has received, possibly a thousand miles, and I presume that that is the condition all over the country. Now, I think that, from the estimate I have made, the calculations on the statements that I have received, these men do not receive as much as a dollar per day, and that evidently is entirely too small wages for the service required. I am in full accord with the gentleman's views on this question.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman, taking a good many of these statements here alone, that the carrier does not receive a dollar a day, and I have no doubt they are entirely honest. Some of them perhaps have been more fortunate than the others, but there are a number of carriers in this list of twenty-five that make only 85 and 90 cents a day clear money for the support of their families. I do not know of any employees of the Government, except the rural carriers, who do not receive from $50 to $60 a month for their service, and the service of the rural carrier is just as important to the people as any service that is rendered in the Post-Office Department. I believe that the committee ought to make an additional appropriation and recommend to this House that the rural carriers receive more pay.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Will the gentleman inform the House how much is paid to carriers in cities for carrying the mail?

Mr. STERLING. Well, I know something about the amount that is paid to carriers in cities. They begin at $600 the first year. The second year they get $800, and then an increase of $100 each year until they reach $1,100. Then there is a provision in the law where in the larger cities the department may promote the carriers to $1,200 a year.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. That is after four years of service. Is it not true that nearly all of these carriers have been employed as much as four years, so that they will be entitled, under the same general plan, to from $1,000 to $1,100—or, at least, from $1,000 to $1,200? Further, what equipment does a city letter carrier have to have? Does he have to have the horses and harness and all other kinds of equipment necessary to carry the mail? Is he required to have extra expenditures of any kind at all?

Mr. STERLING. None whatever. The Government even furnishes him with his mail sack in which to carry the mail.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Is there any good reason at all why a carrier in the country who has to get up before daylight in the morning to take care of his horses and get them ready for the trip, spend the entire day in serving the people in carrying the mail, and then take care of his horses at night, should not have as much at least as the man in the city, who spends from 8 in the morning until about 6 in the evening?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the gentleman from Kansas that I think the city carriers get little enough. I do not think the salaries of city and rural carriers should be equalized by reducing the salaries of the city carrier, yet their services are no more important to the people of the country than that of the rural carriers. The service of the city carrier is not as important to the people in the city as the service of the rural carrier is to the people of the country. Yet I think the city carriers earn all they get.

I think these promotions ought to be made to city carriers just as fast as they can be made. These salaries should be equalized by raising the salary of the rural carrier.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. One more question. I agree most heartily with the gentleman from Illinois upon that subject as far as city carriers are concerned. I say neither the city carriers nor the rural country carriers are getting sufficient for the amount of service which they render. Will the gentleman from Illinois be willing to make this speech and let it rest there, or be willing to join with the rest of this House who believe these salaries ought to be increased and vote to increase them?

Mr. STERLING. I will most heartily vote for any proposition which tends to relieve the situation in regard to the rural carriers. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ADAIR. The gentleman has stated that after deducting expenses, in his judgment, the salary does not exceed $31 or $32 per month. The gentleman from Texas says that he believes from the statements that he has examined that it is even less than that. Does not the gentleman from Illinois believe that even though it was 25 or 50 per cent more than these amounts mentioned, that it would still be less than it ought to be under present conditions?

Mr. STERLING. I think this, I think the rural carriers ought to have at least, in addition to the salary they are now getting, a reasonable sum for the maintenance of their equipment. Seventy-five dollars a month for the support of a family is not too much, and if the Government could make them an allowance, either by increasing the salary or paying them a sum to maintain their equipment, it would make no difference to me, but it ought to make an addition sufficiently large to pay the cost of maintaining the equipment. A farm hand makes more money than a rural carrier. No farm hand gets less than $25 per month. Good farm hands get from $30 to $35 per month and their board, so that the farm hand gets from $45 to $50, and there is no class of labor in the United States that gets so little pay as the rural carriers.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING. I will.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he has ever been able to assign to himself any reason why there have been 25,000 or 30,000 applicants for places in the rural free-delivery service during this year, something like ten times more than the number of vacancies?

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the gentleman, that is not the situation out in my country. I know that a great many rural carriers are considering the advisability of quitting the service, and some of them have done so within a year. I do not know what it is in other localities, but I know that is the situation there. Many of them who are in the service now are considering the question of retiring from the service, and I say that there have been nearly 500 changes in the rural service in the last year, showing that many have quit the service throughout the country, and 150 more have quit the service within the last year than quit the service in the year before.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will permit, I will state that several of them have recently quit in my district, and quit on account of the low wages.

Mr. STERLING. And the department will find that unless Congress does something to help the rural carriers that they will have difficulty in getting good men. And they are good men; they are selected men; men who have taken an examination; men who have qualified and shown their fitness by examination; men who give a bond for the performance of their duties. They are selected men, and they certainly ought to get not the least wage that is paid for any service in the country.

It seems to me they ought to get better pay than is paid for some kinds of labor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Rural Free Delivery News also sent me a list of States showing the average net earnings for the six months and the average per month. It is as follows:

Statement showing the average net earnings of rural letter carriers, after providing and maintaining the equipment necessary for the performance of their duties, for six months ending December 31, 1909. Compiled from expense statements furnished by carriers in practically every congressional district in which Rural Delivery Service is in operation.

Number of changes in the carrier service:

December, 1909	484
December, 1908	344
Increase (40 per cent)	140

This statement shows the average net salary paid to these men throughout the country to be $31.50 per month. Is that enough? Should not men who work every working day in the month get better pay in these times of high prices than $31.50 per month, men who must go in all kinds of weather and over all kinds of roads? Suppose the Government can get men, good men, with equipment, at $900 per year. Men are lured into this service because they want steady employment and a permanent position. They are anxious to work, and must work, and are anxious to work all the time, but the Government ought not take advantage of the necessities of men to get their service at less than a comfortable living salary.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRIEST].

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Chairman, an act of Congress passed March 3, 1845, provided for the transportation of the mails with "celerity, certainty, and security," and those words have been an incentive and a motto to the postal service. It is with special reference to the "celerity" and "certainty" of the mails that these remarks are addressed, for without those important elements the efficiency of the governmental administration of the postal monopoly would be seriously affected.

The celerity of the postal service is attained at a cost of more than $80,000,000 annually for mail transportation by nearly every known mode of conveyance, and the modern conveniences, such as railroads, electric car lines, pneumatic tubes, and automobiles, are freely employed.

In our larger cities there has been established a city delivery service which has developed a laudable standard for "certainty," while throughout the rural territory there has been inaugurated in recent years an efficient and highly valuable postal delivery system officially known as the "rural delivery."

The city and rural delivery systems have attained a high degree of efficiency, and the facilities afforded are of incalculable value to the patrons served and a main factor in the growth and development of our country.

It is officially reported that the City Delivery Service supplies over 40,000,000 people living in the larger cities with a frequency of one to five deliveries daily, and that about 20,000,000 people in the rural districts receive a daily (except Sunday) delivery by carriers. Thus the postal service accords "celerity" and "certainty" to approximately 60,000,000 people. There are, however, many millions of patrons of the postal service who reside in towns with a population of more than 1,000 and less than 10,000 inhabitants who are not accorded "celerity" and "certainty" in the delivery of mail matter, for who no carrier service has been established, and it is in the interest of these people that my appeal is made for the extension of mail-delivery facilities.

By our republican form of government the people are closely associated with the several branches of the Government, but no department is more intimately associated with the people than the postal service. It is a valuable instrumentality for the public good.

The rapid interchange of thought, news and business, as afforded by the modern postal service, has been a mighty factor in enabling the people of the United States "to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity," for which purposes the people of the United States established the Constitution.

In section 8 of the Constitution the Congress is vested with legislative powers over the revenues, commerce, the courts, naturalization, coinage, post-offices and post-roads, the army, the navy, the militia, and given general legislative power to make necessary laws. An important feature of section 8 provides that "the Congress shall have power * * * to establish post-offices and post-roads."

The Federal Government thereby became possessed of a monopoly of the post-office business of the United States. Our forefathers appreciated the necessity of possessing adequate channels of communication, and they framed the constitutional stipulation accordingly. With the appearance of the mail carrier the social, educational, commercial, and political prosperity of the Nation received a wonderful impetus to its development.

With the establishment of regular mail routes between the cities, it was recognized that local delivery facilities were essential, and as early as 1692 the first deputy postmaster-general of America, with the approval of the postmaster-general of England, introduced in the American colonies a postal system whereby mail matter which was not called for at the post-office within forty-eight hours after arrival was to be delivered at the residence of the addressee.

Dr. Benjamin Franklin inaugurated a mail-delivery service by carrier in Philadelphia, but during the colonial period house delivery of mail had an uncertain status.

However, in 1794 the Congress passed a law establishing regular letter-carrier service, and the carriers received 2 cents for each letter delivered, the acceptance or rejection of the service being optional with the patrons. At that time the postmasters were entitled to charge 1 cent "for handling the letter to the addressee." Since 1863 the letter carriers in the mail-delivery service have been paid regular salaries by the Government.

The City Delivery Service is now operative under the act approved January 3, 1887, providing as follows:

SEC. 709. Letter carriers shall be employed for the free delivery of mail matter, as frequently as the public business may require, at every incorporated city, village, or borough containing a population of 50,000 within its corporate limits, and may be so employed at every place containing a population of not less than 10,000 within its corporate limits, according to the last general census, taken by authority of state or United States law, or at any post-office which produced a gross revenue for the preceding fiscal year of not less than $10,000: Provided, This act shall not affect the existence of the free delivery in places where it is now established: And provided further, That in offices where the free delivery shall be established under the provisions of this act, such free delivery shall not be abolished by reason of decrease below 10,000 in population or $10,000 in gross postal revenue, except in the discretion of the Postmaster-General.

Congress has enacted very little legislation concerning the administration of this important branch of the postal service, but under the general authority granted the head of an executive department by section 161 of the Revised Statutes the Postmaster-General has prescribed regulations which experience has shown to be essential for the government of the service. On July 1, 1863, the city delivery was established in 66 cities, with 685 carriers, and the remarkable growth of the cities is illustrated by the fact that the number of cities that enjoyed carrier service June 30, 1909, was 1,440, and the carriers number 27,620. The great importance, the commercial value, and the social benefits of the city mail delivery are so generally recognized that discussion of these is unnecessary.

Practically within the past decade the Congress authorized the establishment of free mail delivery in the rural districts, and experimental routes were established in 1896. The rural delivery promptly assumed permanent form, and in a few years this branch of the postal service has developed until it now serves more than 20,000,000 persons daily (except Sunday) by 40,628 routes.

The statement here submitted graphically details the marvelous development of the rural delivery to July 1, 1908:

[a] Approximations. [b] Not used. [c] No appropriation.

The value of this rural mail delivery is of incalculable value to the Nation in many ways which can not be specifically illustrated in dollars and cents. Upon the farmer and those who reside in the rural communities there rest responsible duties as citizens, and ever has the agriculturist performed an important part in the development of our standards as set forth in the preamble of the Constitution.

To-day the American farmer is prosperous and contented. This condition is largely due to the existence of modern postal conveniences and to other policies which have been followed under the administrations of the Republican party.

The value and importance of both the city and the rural delivery services being recognized, it is most unfortunate that the Post-Office Department should be placed in the position which savors of discrimination against the millions of residents in the smaller cities and towns having from 1,000 to 10,000 inhabitants. There are probably 2,500 or 3,000 such places in this country with presidential post-offices of the second or third classes, having paved and well-lighted streets, good sidewalks, and provided with other conveniences common to the larger cities. The residents in such cities are without mail collection and delivery facilities such as are possessed and valued by their friends in the larger cities and in the rural district. Unless an incorporated community of American citizens can prove a population of 10,000 or more, with gross annual postal receipts in excess of $10,000, there is no delivery accommodation for them. This is an inequality which I think Congress should correct.

Several years ago the Postmaster-General recommended the extension of the city-delivery service to cities with gross annual postal receipts in excess of $5,000, and in the 1908 annual report the First Assistant Postmaster-General made a similar recommendation. He said:

> In view of the very general establishment of rural delivery, which brings mail directly to the homes of the people who live beyond the outskirts of our towns and villages and in the farming districts, the department is placed in the position of discriminating against the residents of smaller towns, who are unable, under the present law, to obtain either rural or city delivery. To meet the needs of such communities and to distribute the mail facilities of the country more equitably an extension of the city-delivery service is proposed.
> The enactment of the proposed law will permit the establishment of free-delivery service in over 1,400 towns, although it is unlikely that during the first year more than 1,000 will comply with the department's requirements relative to sidewalks, street lights, street signs, and house numbers.
> The proposed service will be comparatively inexpensive, as the average number of carriers to a town will be only two. It will be economical in comparison with rural delivery, which costs annually about $2.30 per capita, while the expense of the city service averages but 67 cents per capita, and in many small towns is under 50 cents.

It is admitted that the extension of the present city delivery system to these smaller towns would be highly desirable, but it would be very costly, and for that reason I have introduced a bill providing for an urban free delivery, the provisions of which will be explained later in these remarks. The employees of the city delivery communities necessarily require higher rates of compensation than may be essential in the smaller places. The Postmaster-General estimated that the city delivery could be extended to about 1,400 offices, with an average of two carriers per office, which would result in an expense of approximately $3,000,000 annually. But this would not afford the desired and just benefits to which the people of other presidential second and third class post-offices are entitled.

In the Ninth Congressional District of Pennsylvania, which consists of Lancaster County, there are 16 presidential post-offices. I cite this county as an illustration of my proposition. Lancaster city, a first-class post-office, and Columbia, a second-class office, are the only two places in the district which have collection and delivery mail facilities. Of the other 14 presidential offices 3 are second class and 11 third class. With but a single exception there are rural delivery routes emanating from these presidential post-offices, and in nearly every instance the towns have a population in excess of 1,000 inhabitants. In many cases the postal patrons and residents of the town reside a half mile or more from the post-office, and they are deprived of a desirable postal supply, while a neighbor just a few feet over the corporate boundary line can enjoy the full fruits of a well-developed rural delivery service. This condition of affairs is no doubt familiar to every Member of this House.

As an example I submit the following table as a fair criterion of conditions in nearly every thickly populated district in the country:

Presidential second and third class post-offices in Lancaster County, Pa., which now have no mail-carrier service.

Post-office.	Class.	Salary.	Population.	Rural delivery routes.
Christiana	Third	$1,200	1,100	2

Elizabethtown	do	1,800	2,000	4

Appreciating the needs of these communities, and realizing the necessity of providing an economical plan for the extension of the mail collection and delivery benefits to these citizens against whom there exists this discrimination, the following bill was introduced by me in December last:

A bill (H. R. 14604) for the establishment of a mail-delivery system at post-offices of the second and third classes.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after July 1, 1910, the Postmaster-General may establish urban delivery service for the free delivery of mail matter as frequently as the public business may require at every incorporated city, village, or borough containing a population of not less than 1,000 within its corporate limits according to the last general census taken by authority of State or United States law and having a post-office of the second or third class.

SEC. 2. That applications for such urban delivery service shall be made according to rules to be prescribed by the Postmaster-General, who may adopt suitable regulations as to sidewalks, gates, numbering of houses, naming of streets, and the placing of approved mail receptacles at the door or entrance of residences and offices.

SEC. 3. That the urban delivery service may be employed for the collection and delivery of mail for patrons of a second or third class post-office residing without and adjacent to the corporate limits of any city, village, or borough having urban delivery service, under such rules and regulations as the Postmaster-General may adopt.

SEC. 4. That letter carriers of the urban delivery service shall upon appointment receive a salary not exceeding $600 per annum, and may be promoted after one year's service to $720; and where the service shall require more than one delivery each day the carriers performing such service may after two years' service receive a compensation at a rate not exceeding $900 per annum, or when the exigencies of the service shall require the employment of a mounted carrier such carrier may be allowed horse hire at a rate which, combined with the salary paid said carrier, shall not in the aggregate exceed $900 annually.

SEC. 5. That such statutes as have heretofore been enacted with reference to the city delivery and rural delivery services are hereby extended to the urban delivery service so far as they are applicable.

The provisions of this bill contemplate the creation of a feature of the post-office delivery service which might properly be viewed as an extension of the Rural Delivery Service, while, in fact, it also embodies the principles of the city delivery. By reference to the first section of the bill it will be noted that the provisions are similar to those enacted as a part of the law authorizing the establishment of the City Delivery Service, including stipulations as to incorporation, population, and so forth.

The second section has been framed to meet the recommendations of the Post-Office Department with reference to sidewalks, gates, numbering of houses, naming of streets, and the placing of approved mail receptacles at the door or entrance of residences, as suggested, for application to towns of less than 10,000 population.

The third section authorizes the use of urban delivery letter carriers for the delivery and collection of mail outside the corporate limits when the exigencies of the service might necessitate travel beyond such limits in going from one portion of a route to another or for the purpose of serving a rural patronage adjacent to the corporate limits and without supply by a rural carrier, such facilities being incidental to the service on the urban delivery route provided within the corporate boundary.

The fourth section provides for the appointment of urban letter carriers at the minimum salary of $600 per annum. After the first year of satisfactory service they may be promoted to $720. This rate would undoubtedly be the maximum salary of most of the carriers at the offices entitled to proposed mail-delivery facilities. There would be practically no places where mounted carriers would be required, and in but few small towns is there much real necessity for more than one mail delivery per day. Thus the great majority of the urban delivery carriers would receive $720 annually. The maximum urban delivery carrier pay would be $900 annually.

In such cases where the conditions necessitate two deliveries a day the carriers would not receive the $900 rate until after they shall have had two years' satisfactory service. This arrangement would permit of service development and resultant increased revenues before reaching the maximum cost of operation, and the expense of the carrier, together with the increased efficiency, would justify additional compensation on the scale of advancement provided as an incentive for diligent service.

There are about 5,000 second and third class post-offices which do not now have mail-delivery facilities. Many of these are rated as third class only because of their gross annual postal receipts, owing to the existence of some prosperous industry in the community, while in fact the population is small and far less than 1,000. Furthermore, there are many places which, for various reasons, would be unable to comply with the requirements and become beneficiaries under the terms of the proposed law at an early date. Hence it is fair to presume that with a liberal estimate hardly more than 2,000 of the nondelivery second and third class offices would qualify during the first year or two.

Accepting a liberal estimate of 2,000 offices, with an average of one and a half carriers per office, the total expense of the urban bill for the year would barely exceed two and a half million dollars, and the mail-delivery facilities might be extended to all eligible second and third class presidential post-offices at a maximum expense of about five millions, while many millions of industrious and prosperous citizens would be benefited. This expense would be inconsiderable when it is noted that we are now expending $30,090,000 annually for the city delivery and about $38,000,000 for rural delivery. We are also expending millions for other public conveniences which do not so directly serve the great masses of people as would the urban bill if enacted into law.

The failure of the Government to provide a mail-delivery service for the citizens of the smaller cities or towns is an unjust discrimination not alone because these benefits have not been granted uniformly as provided for the larger cities and in the rural districts. The nondelivery second and third class post-offices are rightly entitled to these modern facilities, because the postal revenues from such offices warrant the employment of a mail carrier in such communities. Before a post-office of the fourth class can be assigned to the third or presidential class the gross postal receipt for four consecutive quarters must amount to at least $1,900. At this minimum rate of revenue the salary of the postmaster is $1,000 per annum, leaving a difference of $900 for clerk hire and such other incidentals as enter into the expense of operating the office. But few of these offices consume a considerable portion of that $900, and as the scale raises the balance in favor of the postal earnings increases. The cost of an economical delivery service would not consume the present profit from the third-class offices, and it would give the larger third-class and all of the nondelivery second-class offices a just return on the basis of the postal receipts at such offices. In this connection it is proper to recall that the postal revenues at these nondelivery post-offices are produced largely by postage on first-class matter, and practically no second-class mail originates at such offices. Inasmuch as the Postmaster-General in his last annual report announced that the annual profit from first-class mail matter was over $53,000,000, it would seem reasonable to apply a portion of this profit for the convenience of the citizens who assist in creating it.

Not only are the nondelivery second and third class offices now self-supporting and profitable, but it is the experience of the postal authorities that the installation of every modern postal development produces increased revenues, and this is always evident when an office is granted city delivery facilities.

During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1909, the 1,440 city delivery offices produced gross receipts in excess of $149,000,000, and the service cost $29,738,123, or 19.93 per cent of the gross receipts, affording a very handsome margin. In the case of the rural delivery service, the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General presents an interesting statement for the year, showing an 87 per cent increase in the total amount of rural mail delivered and 151 per cent in the mail collected, or a total of 96 per cent in the total amount handled.

Recognizing that the so-called "deficit of the Post-Office Department" was greater for the fiscal year 1909 than that for any previous year in the history of the department, it is not expected that favorable consideration of the urban delivery bill will be accorded at this session; but inasmuch as the Republican party has ever been a progressive organization, and to it belongs the credit for the great city and rural delivery mail systems of to-day, the people of the country will look to the Republican party for a further extension of the mail-delivery facilities. The people are filing with the Congress petitions setting forth their desires and needs for an extension of the mail-delivery conveniences. As soon as the government finances shall permit, these appeals must be seriously considered, and the mail-delivery system must be extended to meet the requirements of the urban delivery bill.

In the Republican platform of 1892 the party announced that—

> We approve the policy of extending to towns, villages, and rural communities the advantages of the free-delivery service now enjoyed by the larger cities of the country.

Again, in 1900, the Republican platform contained the following plank:

> We favor the extension of the rural free-delivery service wherever its extension may be justified.

These assurances to the people have been fulfilled as rapidly as the conditions of the finances have allowed. In the meantime, however, the chasm of nonfree delivery existing between the city and the rural services has grown to such proportions that to-day it is discriminatory and unjust, and the chasm should be bridged as speedily as possible.

It has been both a duty and a pleasure to advocate this proposed extension of mail-delivery facilities to provide improved service for the residents of the smaller cities and towns, and I trust that the Congress will at an early date wisely consider the necessity of enacting legislation which will extend to all of the American people the ideal postal delivery service now enjoyed by three-fourths of them.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that all listened with interest and profit to-day to the very able presentation of this bill by the distinguished Member from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], having it in charge, and on the first day of its introduction in the House of Representatives I believe we followed with great interest the speech of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. Every member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, whether on this side—a regular or an insurgent—or a Representative on the other side of the Chamber, agrees that the time has come for a reorganization of this great department of the Government. I want to say as a Representative, and one who had his beginning in the government service as a clerk in that department thirty-one years ago that, in my judgment, Congress has been remiss in its duty in not having perfected a reorganization of the department many, many years ago. It is a department nearer to the people of this country than any of the great executive departments of the Government, and the committee that attempts to make this department self-sustaining at the expense of the extension and the efficiency of the service will not receive public approval at the hands of the people.

Why should this department be self-sustaining and produce a revenue equal to the cost of its administration? Is that rule applied to any other great department of the Government? If so, when and how? However, if the committee is bent upon a programme of that kind, let me suggest to the committee needed legislation looking to giving the Government a monopoly of the mail business, and stop a division of it with the express companies of this country. [Applause.] If you will report a bill prohibiting the express companies from transporting valuable letters and papers, money orders, daily newspapers, and magazines, then you will wipe out the deficit in the Post-Office Department without impairing or injuring any branch of the service.

There are other sources of revenue. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], in his interruption of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], asked: "Why not give the American people a local parcels post in the interest of progress and in the interest of the people, and secure a division of the express business?"

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of California. Is it not true that we already have a local and general parcels post?

Mr. AUSTIN. Not as understood and not as advocated and believed in by the American people.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will you give the definition of what that is?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes. The parcels post that will prevent the mail-order houses of the great cities from monopolizing the local trade of local merchants along the rural delivery routes of the country. A parcel post in line with the best now in operation in European countries. We could also make money for the Post-Office Department and also relieve the people by providing a postal telegraph system.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will you allow me to put in the RECORD as a part of your speech——

Mr. AUSTIN. No, sir.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will you allow me to state at this time——

Mr. AUSTIN. No, sir. You can interview the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and secure a little time in which to make your own speech. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, we ought to have a reorganization of that department. We have had the work of commission after commission, and by and by perhaps we will have another commission, and future Congresses will continue to appoint commissions. We need a director of posts. While there would possibly be no applicant for that position from my own district, I do not know of a more efficient man for it than the present Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I know the gentleman has made a long study of postal affairs; let me ask him what he would make the tenure of the director-general?

Mr. AUSTIN. For life and during efficiency.

Mr. MURDOCK. You would continue him in office?

Mr. AUSTIN. I would continue him in office.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. Provided there is no speech attached to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of California. Do I understand you would give the director of posts a free hand in the matter of repealing the manifold regulations that now tie everybody's hand in connection with postal service?

Mr. AUSTIN. The previous chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, a Representative from Indiana, submitted a reorganization plan to this House that ought to have been adopted. Then if any changes are made necessary by experience to perfect it, Congress could by legislation from time to time improve it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know it is a very easy matter to criticise a bill. It is easy to find fault with the provisions of any bill. I want to submit what I consider some just criticisms to this pending measure. The Republican party, in its platform at Chicago, as I said this afternoon in interrupting the chairman of the committee, pledged itself to an extension of the rural delivery system until every rural community in the land should have its benefits. Now, that pledge, Mr. Chairman, was made in the national convention at Chicago, made when we were passing through a panic, when there was just the same demand and necessity for economy as now; yet in the face of the financial condition of the country and the great deficit in the Treasury Department, that plank was written in the Republican platform in Chicago, pledging the party on this side of the Chamber that if intrusted with power we would extend the advantages of the free delivery system to the rural districts of this country. What provision does this bill carry looking to a fulfillment of that pledge? Why an appropriation of $285,000 for additional rural delivery service? There are perhaps 6,000,000 farmers in this country, and we are supplying to-day rural service to one-half of that number. There are already approved in the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General's office 1,000 rural delivery routes ready for service, which will more than take all of the money carried in this bill. There are 1,600 petitions for new routes in the department awaiting investigation.

Mr. Chairman, this was not only the platform upon which our candidate appealed to the farming interests of this country, and upon which he succeeded, but I doubt not every Republican Member on this side of the Chamber who has an agricultural constituency pledged the voters that he would favor an extension of the rural delivery system.

Now, if this item in this bill is not increased, during the next year not a single solitary additional rural-delivery route will be established in the United States, not one. No Member of Congress can vote for this item in this bill and go home and look his constituency in the face and justify that vote if he has previously made a pledge to favor the extension of the rural-delivery system.

According to President Taft's speeches, which I will insert, we are raising sufficient money under the new tariff law to meet the necessary expenses to care for new service and better pay for the carriers.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. No, sir.

Mr. BENNET of New York. How much money do you think ought to be appropriated to fulfill the party pledges?

Mr. AUSTIN. I would extend that service just as fast as the corps of inspectors of the Post-Office Department could visit the localities and report upon the petitions. Three million American farmers have the daily papers to-day, giving them the market reports daily and 3,000,000 have not the advantage of that information. It is unfair and unjust to the agricultural people of this country to deny them the benefits, advantages, and blessings that follow the establishment of the rural-delivery system. Why, this bill carries in it a provision looking to the establishment of 500 rural routes and 1,000 additional city routes for the delivery of daily mail in the cities of this country. To-day in the great city of New York eight deliveries a day are made to the favored population of a certain section of that city, with a denial here of one delivery a day to one-half of the farmers in the agricultural sections of the country.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee does not intend to leave the impression that eight deliveries are made to the residences in New York?

Mr. AUSTIN. "The gentleman from Tennessee" never attempted to make that impression.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, it is my impression, my knowledge, in fact, that deliveries are made later at night in residence portions of New York. In the neighborhood of my residence a delivery is made at 8 o'clock at night.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have this to say: You need not talk about extravagance or economy if you are voting money here to give the residents of New York City a night delivery when you withhold from the farmers a single day delivery. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word about the character of the men of the Rural Delivery Service. Mark you, if this appropriation is not increased, there will be an average of 12 additional routes for each State in the Union, and there are over 337 congressional districts to-day with Rural Delivery Service in them, located in 47 States and Territories.

The President of the United States believes in economy, but above and beyond that the President has on every occasion insisted that the pledges made by his party and contained in its platform should be carrier out in good faith. One of those pledges, just as binding as any other pledge in that platform, is an extension of the Rural Delivery Service to all portions of the country where it is needed.

Mr. ADAIR. Has the gentleman any information as to why the department has not used all of the appropriation at its disposal for this purpose?

Mr. AUSTIN. I have not. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BENNET of New York. Before the gentleman starts in again, can the gentleman give us an idea of the amount of money that he thinks ought to be appropriated this year in order to carry out the party pledges? I am asking the question in good faith.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let me answer it in my own way. The Post-Office Department has adopted a certain method to be pursued prior to the establishment of these rural-delivery routes. For instance, they require the people to sign a petition bearing the names of not less than 100 families. That petition is filed in the Post-Office Department, referred to an inspector, who is required to go on the ground, to ride over the route, verify the statements in the petition, and return it with a favorable or unfavorable report, and upon that the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General takes final action. I will say to the gentleman, I would vote to-day to double the number of rural-delivery carriers in the United States, and I would vote for any amount of money necessary to carry out in good faith that promise made to the American voters living in the rural districts.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes; but you do not say how much.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; because I do not know.

Mr. BENNET of New York. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, the rural carriers ought to have more money. I have reports here showing that in the congressional district that I represent men whom I know personally, who have made these returns, receive net average salaries per month of $30.62, $40, $40.99, $34.42, $44, $55, and $38.19. Practically every supply that a rural carrier must furnish to maintain himself has advanced in price. Does the Republican party believe in good wages? Certainly it does. Are we making that profession good when we are insisting on paying 40,000 of the trained, experienced, and deserving public officials of this Government an average of less than $32 a month net out of which to support themselves and families? Why, the city carriers are given, as stated here, after three or four years in the service, $100 a month—none too much—and they do their work in cities with paved streets and sidewalks, and if they are required to deliver their mail by wagon or vehicle they are given an additional allowance of $250 a year.

Now, something is said about the resignations of rural carriers. There were 2,526 resignations last year, 19 per cent greater than the number in the year preceding.

[The time of Mr. AUSTIN having expired, Mr. WEEKS yielded to him five minutes more.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Since the annual report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, during the month of July, 1909, there were 178 resignations; in August, 297 resignations; in September, 333 resignations; in October, 356; in November, 472; in December, 475; in January, 1910, 493; over 10 per cent of resignations of the entire force going out of the service on account of insufficient pay.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say this: We are the richest nation in the world. And yet the very fact that we are paying these low wages is a reflection upon the American Government, and will be a reflection upon the American Congress if it does not correct it.

What is the character of the men in this service? Out of 40,499 carriers only 175 were dismissed for cause, and of those dismissed, 36 were for embezzlement of the funds and 35 for intoxication. There is no better record in any branch of the government service or in employment by private corporations, for honesty and efficiency, than that revealed by the records of these 40,499 rural carriers. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, Members on both sides of this Chamber, recognizing the justice of this cause, introduced bills which were referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads asking that this condition be changed. Fifteen of us appeared before that able committee with information gathered from over 4,000 of these rural carriers scattered from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf, showing the insufficient pay of the rural carriers, and in response the committee placed this provision in the bill:

That the Post-Office Department shall investigate and report to Congress not later than December 10, 1910, its conclusion as to the advisability of the transferring of the Rural Delivery Service and the star-route service to one bureau, its conclusion as to the advisability of a classification of the Rural Delivery Service, taking into consideration mileage, climatic conditions, condition of roads, the local cost of animals and feed, and any other facts which bear on a reorganization and improvement of this service.

We asked them for bread and they gave us a stone. Yet they will not report a bill here; our hands are absolutely tied under the rules of this House. Why? Nineteen men virtually say they will not report a bill increasing the pay of the rural carriers. Here are 40,499 deserving officials scattered throughout the districts we represent, and yet they can not have relief, and we can not have a yea-and-nay vote or an opportunity to do justice by them.

Mr. Chairman, if I live long enough and have the honor to represent a district on the floor of this House, I will never cast a vote for a set of rules that will make it possible for any 19 men to deny 391 Representatives an opportunity to do justice by American citizens who are faithful, worthy, and deserving officials. [Applause.]

Now, I have talked long enough. I hope there will be enough votes on this side of the Chamber added to the votes on the other side to change this bill, to change it in the interest of fair play. That is what we want, that is what we demand; nothing less, nothing more. If the pledge contained in the Republican platform, binding alike on every Member on this side of the Chamber, is not carried out, that responsibility shall not rest upon me. I will do all that is in my power to redeem it. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

THE AMERICAN FARMER.

[From the Republican national platform, 1908.]

Among those whose welfare is as vital to the welfare of the whole country as that of the wage-earner is the American farmer. The prosperity of the country rests peculiarly upon the prosperity of agriculture. The Republican party during the last twelve years has accomplished extraordinary work in bringing the resources of the National Government to the aid of the farmer, not only in advancing agriculture itself, but in increasing the conveniences of rural life. Free rural mail delivery has been established; it now reaches millions of our citizens, and we favor its extension until every community in the land receives the full benefits of the postal service. We recognize the social and economical advantages of good country roads, maintained more and more largely at public expense and less and less at the expense of the abutting owner. In this work we commend the growing practice of state aid, and we approve the efforts of the National Agricultural Department, by experiments and otherwise, to make clear to the public the best methods of road construction.

TAFT'S SPEECH AT NEWARK—PRESIDENT REVIEWS EXPENDITURES OF THE GOVERNMENT—BUDGET SYSTEM LACKING—FAVORS COMMISSION TO SUGGEST BETTER METHODS—GREAT NEEDS POINTED OUT—PAYS HIS RESPECTS TO NEWSPAPER CRITICS IN AN ADDRESS TO THE NEWARK BOARD OF TRADE.

NEWARK, N. J., February 24.

President Taft came to Newark yesterday afternoon by automobile from New York, and addressed the board of trade last night.

In beginning his speech the President said that he had told ex-Governor Murphy a year ago that "I had hoped to make good, but I am not so sure of it now."

The President paid his respects to the newspapers opposed to his administration and himself. He said their attitude was either one of open hostility or patronizing friendship.

"The newspapers," continued the President, "do not carry all of the public opinion in their vest pockets. Perhaps the American people are able to see through something approaching hypercriticism, something of hysteria, something of hypocrisy, and to have a considerable responsi- the man under a considerable responsibility who is doing the best he can. With this flattering reception in my mind, which has something very sincere about it, I will return to Washington and avoid the newspapers."

PRESIDENT TAFT'S ADDRESS.

The President said:

"When I accepted the invitation to come here I learned that I was to have the pleasure of being a fellow-guest with my friend Senator LODGE, and that he was to take up the question of high prices—a question which has occupied the attention of all the people and has invited the investigation into its cause of the Congress of the United States and some of the state legislatures. For my part of the evening I should like to direct your attention to a more prosy subject—to the question of government expenditures and government revenues, and the possible economies, and what expenditures are essential at whatever burden of taxation.

"In the first place, it should be said that we have been so far from exhausting the resources of national taxation and federal revenues have been collected so easily and in such an amount that we have failed in the past to adopt a budget system, which is practiced in every other civilized country. By a budget system I mean a reference of proposed expenditures and receipts to some one authority or tribunal, which, after determining what the revenues will be, must also determine what the expenditures can be and make a budget without deficit.

REVENUES AND EXPENSES.

"In our legislative body which provides the revenue and authorizes the expenditures time was when the Committee on Ways and Means, on the one hand, determined the revenues of the Government or provided the laws for raising them, and, on the other hand, determined the appropriations and measured the expenditures. But for many years in our Congress these functions have been divided. The revenues are provided by the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate and submitted to their respective Houses, while the appropriations are made by the Appropriation Committees of the House and Senate, and in too many instances without apparent reference to the revenues which are to be available to meet the appropriations.

"It has so happened that in many years of the past the revenues have increased more rapidly than the expenditures, and there has been a surplus. During the life of the Dingley bill, which carried us from 1896 to 1908, the revenues exceeded the expenditures by about $250,000,000, but the surplus took place in the earlier years, so that in 1908 we had a deficit and in 1909 we had a deficit.

"The pinching effect of the falling off of the revenues and discontinuances of the expenditures at the same rate attracted the attention of Congress, so that now a preliminary duty is thrown upon the Secretary of the Treasury to make a budget; that is, by law he is required to receive all the estimates of all the departments, himself to make an estimate of the probable revenues, and if his calculations show a deficit, to recommend legislation for additional taxation or the raising of money by bonds sufficient to meet it.

increased to $50,000,000. On the other hand, if the Congress proposes to add to the expenditures of the Government over those estimated for for new enterprises in the river and harbor bill and for the construction of the federal buildings under a building act, it will be very easy to consume or exceed the entire surplus.

RECEIPTS UNDER NEW TARIFF.

"The calculation of the Secretary of the Treasury for the present year showed that the deficit was likely to be $34,000,000 in respect to ordinary receipts and expenditures. I am glad to say that the operation of the new tariff bill has been so much more productive of income that this deficit for the current year is likely to be considerably reduced. In addition, however, to the ordinary deficit, we have to add the Panama Canal expenditures, calling for immediate provision for $38,000,000, or what was estimated to be a total deficit of $72,000,000 is now reduced considerably by the better rates under the present tariff bill.

"By meeting the expenditures on the Panama Canal by the proceeds of the bond issues we have enough cash in the Treasury to meet the deficit in our ordinary expenses for the current year, and if we meet the expenditures on the Panama Canal for the following year, we shall have a surplus of $35,000,000, or if the revenue-producing capacity of the new tariff keeps up to its present indications, this surplus may be increased to $50,000,000. On the other hand, if the Congress proposes to add to the expenditures of the Government over those estimated for new enterprises in the river and harbor bill and for the construction of the federal buildings under a building act, it will be very easy to consume or exceed the entire surplus.

PAYING FOR CANAL WITH BONDS.

"Everyone must admit the wisdom of providing for the payment of the canal expenditure by bonds. The original act made provision for the issuing of bonds, and while the amount therein estimated was far short of the actual cost, the policy of the Government in supplying funds for the enterprise by bonds was sufficiently declared. This is a work of a permanent character for the millions who come after us, and it seems only fair that that which we provide in such a generous measure for posterity should be paid for in part, at least, by posterity.

"Not only is the application of such a principle just and right in the case of an enterprise like the Panama Canal, but it seems to me wise and appropriate to adopt it with reference to other projects which commend themselves to Congress and the economical completion of which requires the issuing of bonds. I refer to those definite projects that have been agreed upon in respect to the improvement of our inland waterways. I would not begin the expenditure of any money on any project the wisdom of which had not been fully vindicated by experts and the cost of which had not been fully ascertained by the most experienced engineers; but having determined to put through the improvement it ought not to be done by fits and starts, but it ought to be done as one job, and provision for its completion ought to be made by the issuing of bonds, unless the current revenues afford a sufficient amount to complete it within an economical time.

WATERWAY IMPROVEMENTS.

"This statement has peculiar application to the river and harbor bill which now has passed the House. There the Ohio River improvement, to cost $63,000,000, is entered upon and an appropriation made for its continuing. The same thing is true of the improvement of the Mississippi from St. Paul to St. Louis, and the same river from St. Louis to Cairo, and of the Missouri River from Kansas City to St. Louis. These projects seem to be warranted by the traffic in sight.

"While I am dealing with the Panama Canal, however, I ought to refer to the discrepancy between the estimated cost of the enterprise and the actual cost, as we are now able to fix it, with very considerable accuracy, within four or five years of its completion.

"The estimated cost of the engineering and construction of the canal was $139,700,000. Its actual cost for engineering and construction will be $297,000,000, an increase of about $157,300,000. This increase is to be explained, first, by the very great appreciation in the cost of labor and material between the time when the estimate was made in 1900 and the time when the work was done between 1904 and 1909; second, by the fact that the canal had been enlarged substantially beyond the original dimensions estimated for.

"You know that the great work of excavation in the canal is called the Culebra cut. This is where the backbone of the continent, reduced to its lowest height, is cut through in order to permit the flowing of the canal, and through 5 miles of that cut, which altogether is about 9 miles long, for purposes of economy the original plan and estimate made the bottom of the canal in the rock 200 feet wide. This would not enable two of the largest steamers to pass each other in the canal with any degree of safety and would require that one of them should tie up to the bank while the other went by.

"In order to avoid this delay in that part of the canal, it has been thought wise to increase the bottom width from 200 to 300 feet in a place and in material that, of course, make the change most expensive. So, too, in order that the canal may be adapted to the largest size of steamers possible, the dimensions of the 6 locks have been increased from 900 feet usable length by 90 feet width to 1,000 feet usable length and 110 feet width. This was done at the instance of the Navy Department on the ground that they could look forward to the future and see vessels of a beam exceeding 100 feet.

"It has also been found necessary to change the channel of the canal on the Pacific side from a lake with a dam and locks on the shore of the bay of Panama to a sea-level canal running 4 miles inland, so as to remove the locks 4 miles inward and beyond the possible reach of the guns of an enemy in Panama Bay. These two changes also have added very considerably to the cost.

"Again, it has been found wise to enlarge the canal into a lake in the basin at the foot of the Gatun locks, and whatever variation in the plans which experience in the construction has demonstrated the necessity for, the more than doubling the cost of constructing and engineering has been necessary. In addition to this, the cost of sanitation and government, without which the canal could not have been built, will be about $73,000,000, and will carry the entire cost of the canal to $373,000,000.

CUT TO NEARLY $50,000,000.

"To return to the state of finances, I repeat that the surplus for the year ended June 30, 1911, for which we are now making provision in this Congress by appropriation will be about $35,000,000, if the estimates made by the departments and transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress are not exceeded, and if the revenue from the tariff bill equals that which the Secretary of the Treasury has estimated it as likely to be. This surplus is also upon the supposition that the $38,000,000 necessary annually in the construction of the Panama Canal will be met by bonds.

"In view of the threatened shortage for the year ended June 30, 1911, I directed the heads of departments in making their estimates to cut them to the quick and to avail themselves of every possible economy and reduction. The result was that the total of the estimates forwarded by the Secretary of the Treasury was $42,818,000 less than the total of the appropriations for the previous year ended June 30, 1910.

"A river and harbor bill has now been introduced and has passed the House, which appropriates nearly $40,000,000. This is a very considerable increase over the amount estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury. In addition to this, if a building bill passes Congress appropriating $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 for the coming fiscal year, there may still be a deficit, unless the receipts from the tariff bill and the corporation tax exceed what was originally estimated from them. I am bound to say that the results of the tariff bill thus far indicate a considerable increase over the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Now, I would like for a moment to go into the question of what it was that we cut down in our estimate for the coming year in the departments.

"The reduction in the estimates of the War Department below the appropriation of last year amounted to $10,000,000. The reduction in the estimates of the Navy Department for the expenses of the year ending June 30, 1911, also amounted to $10,000,000. The reduction in the Interior Department of estimated expenses for 1911 below the appropriations for 1910 amounted to $8,000,000. The reduction in the Treasury and in the Post-Office Department made up the balance of the $42,000,000.

EXPENDITURES POSTPONED.

"Speaking with reference to the army and the navy, it should be said that the reductions were not in what may be called the 'permanent expenses' of the departments, but were rather in cutting down proposed improvements, which, if the plans of the departments are properly carried out, must some time be met. In other words, it is a postponement only of expenditures that are general until the income is sufficient to meet them.

"Let us take the War Department. There was a very considerable cut in the expenditures needed to complete with modern appliances the coast defenses on the Pacific and Atlantic seaboard. There is needed at the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay, between Cape Henry and Cape Charles, an artificial island upon the so-called 'middle ground,' which shall command the entrance to Chesapeake Bay. Chesapeake Bay is the most important body of water from a strategic naval standpoint on the whole Atlantic coast, and it must be defended.

"So, too, we have now determined that the great naval base of the Pacific for us is to be Pearl Harbor, near Honolulu. For years there was a discussion as to whether we ought to make the naval base at Subic Bay or at Cavit, in Manila Bay, in the Philippines. By unanimous consent of naval and military authorities it is now conceded that we do not need a naval base in the Philippines at all; that we ought to make Corregidor Island, at the mouth of Manila Bay, impregnable, establish a naval supply station in Subic Bay, but rely on the Sandwich Islands as our base. This will all involve a heavy expenditure at Honolulu, but for the present the amount proposed is comparatively small.

TWO NEW BATTLE SHIPS.

"In the naval expenditures we have retained a provision for two battle ships of the large 25,000-ton capacity, and we have done this on the ground that until the Panama Canal is completed we ought to go on and add to our naval strength. The Panama Canal will certainly be completed in 1915, and if we have two battle ships a year until that time, the opening of the canal will so double the efficacy of our navy for the protection of our Pacific and Atlantic coasts that we can then abate and reduce our expenditures in new construction.

"The reductions in the Treasury Department were, I think, more of them in the administration than in the expenditures for improvements, and this was also the case in the Post-Office Department.

"The reduction in the Interior Department—$5,000,000—was due to a reduction of the amount of pensions to be paid out, and we may reasonably hope that as the years now go on this amount will gradually be reduced.

"On the other hand, there are certain of our departments, to wit, the Agricultural Department, with its Forestry Bureau; the War Department, in so far as it is a constructive department for the improvement of rivers; the Department of Commerce and Labor, including, as it ought, it seems to me, a bureau of health, which—as opportunities for bettering the conditions of the people by government investigation increase—grow in importance and cost, and we ought not to expect a reduction, either, in the expenses growing out of a conservation of our resources.

ANNUAL COST OF GOVERNMENT.

"For some time it has been said that we have 'billion-dollar' Congresses. The statement in itself is an unjust one, because it is generally construed to mean that the total expenses of the departments to be paid out of taxation amount to a billion dollars a year. This is quite an error, for the reason that in making up the billion dollars the expenses for the Post-Office Department are always included, whereas the expenses of the Post-Office Department are not paid for out of the proceeds of taxes. They are paid for out of the receipts of that department from the sale of stamps, with the exception of $17,500,000, which was the excess of the cost of the Post-Office Department last year over its receipts. This, therefore, reduces the cost by taxation of the Government each year to something like $750,000,000.

"It is now proposed to appoint a congressional commission to look into the question of a general reorganization of the departments of the Government, with a view to reducing the expense of administering the Government. I think I have already made clear the distinction between those expenditures of the Government that go into permanent improvements, and that may be reduced one year and must be increased another, and the actual routine cost of administration. A reduction in the cost of proposed improvements is not an elimination of them, but merely a postponement of them, whereas a reduction in the cost of administration would be a permanent economy that, of course, on that account becomes most important.

GREATER SAVING POSSIBLE.

"It has been stated on the floor of the Senate that it will be possible by this commission to reduce the cost of administering the Government $100,000,000 a year, and that if a free hand were given to a business man the reduction in the expense of administration might be doubled or tripled. I am unable to confirm these statements as to exact amount, but I am very sure that a conservative, prudent, and fearless commission could make a most material reduction in the cost of administering the Government.

"They will find opposition in Congress to every change recommended, because there is no branch or bureau so humble that it can not secure its adherents and defenders within the legislative halls. But if by the totals that it shows this commission shall justify its existence, it is probable that it can secure a majority sufficient to carry through its proposed reforms. This Government has been constructed not all at one time, but bureau has been added to bureau, and department to department, and it has been impossible to avoid duplication and expensive methods.

"In creating a new bureau there was no time to go back and reform the Government with reference to the adjustment of that bureau to its proper place or to consider the work of the entire Government with reference to it. This proposed commission, as I understand it, is to take up the bureaus of all the departments, is to see whether they may not often be connected, and also to lay down such rules governing the civil service as will secure the utmost efficiency from each civil servant or each unit of labor.

CIVIL PENSIONS FAVORED.

"It is undoubtedly true to-day that we have a great many more persons employed in the Government than we would need if every person in the Government rendered to the Government a service of a high degree of efficiency. This commission will have to take up the question which has troubled great industrial corporations and great railroads, as to the methods of disposing of superannuated servants. Our military pensions have reached so large an annual sum, to wit, $150,000,000, that we have avoided the suggestion of civil pensions, but I am convinced that some method must be adopted by which superannuated civil servants may be retired on an income sufficient to support them, and that such a provision will ultimately bring about great economy in the administration.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT DEFICIT.

"It has been reported by the Postmaster-General that we are carrying in the Post-Office Department the weekly periodicals and magazines at a loss to that department of upward of $60,000,000, and that the business of the Government in the Post-Office Department is now run at a general loss of $17,500,000. The committees of Congress are investigating the correctness of this view. The owners of magazines dispute the correctness of the figures. There ought to be some way certainly of determining this fact; and if it is a fact, it calls for a reform and an increase in the postage of a sufficient amount at least to take away the deficit in the Post-Office Department. Should the two postal committees not be able to reach a conclusion satisfactory to them under this question, the whole matter may well be left to the commission to consider.

"It will be essential for this commission to employ expert men who have had to do with the organization of great businesses and who are familiar with the most modern methods of economy. The truth is that the success of modern business has been the adoption of successful economies, and the time has come for us to make an effort at least to introduce something of these economies into an administration of the greatest business that we have in this country—the business of our Federal Government.

GREAT REFORMS POSSIBLE.

"I am quite aware that things done by the Government are done under conditions so different from those of a business concern that there are certain expenditures necessary, in view of the fact that the government business done is for the benefit of all the people, and that therefore all the people are entitled to know how it is done, and a number of them are entitled to be selected in a fair way to share in its doing. But, in spite of the added expenditure of administration incident to the requirements of popular government, everyone familiar with government methods now in vogue must recognize the possibility of reforms leading to great economy, if the Congress shall have the courage to adopt plans which may be recommended by this commission after a full examination by business experts.

"I have already occupied your time too much, and I, perhaps, have not made this statement very informing or interesting, but I can not close without congratulating you and myself on the prospect that the present tariff bill offers such an increased income as to make any deficits under any condition unnecessary. Of course, if there were to be a halt in our prosperity and a panic the reduction in imports might be so substantial as to lead to deficits again."

[Extract from President Taft's speech at Lincoln birthday banquet of the Republican Club of New York City, February 12, 1910.]

For the production of revenue, the Payne law is even more an improvement on the Dingley bill. During the six months that the Payne tariff was in force, from August 5 to the night of February 5, the customs receipts amounted to $166,002,856.54. Under the Wilson-Gorman tariff the semiannual average was $83,147,625.90. Under the Dingley tariff the semiannual average was $130,265,841.84. Under the Wilson tariff the monthly average was $13,857,937.65. Under the Dingley tariff the monthly average was $21,710,973.64; while under the Payne tariff the monthly average has been $27,667,142.75, or 100 per cent greater than the monthly average under the Wilson tariff and 26 per cent greater than the monthly average under the Dingley tariff.

Of course as the country increases in population the customs receipts increase, but even considering the population, the increase in the tariff receipts has been marked. Under the Wilson tariff the average annual customs receipts per capita were $2.38; under the Dingley tariff, $3.23; while under the Payne tariff they are $3.71.

For the six months that the Payne tariff has been in force the total receipts, both from customs and internal revenue, have been $323,899,231.91, while the disbursements have been $332,783,283.08, showing an excess of disbursements over receipts of about $8,884,051.17, with no collection as yet from the corporation tax. For the corresponding period last year the expenditures exceeded the receipts by over $40,000,000. This showing indicates that under the present customs law the deficit will be promptly wiped out, and that to meet our normal expenditure we shall have ample revenue.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the bill (H. R. 6516) introduced during the first session of this Congress by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] has for its purpose the reduction of the South's representation in the House. It is to this proposed iniquitous measure that I wish to make reference and to enter an earnest protest.

Knowing the membership of this House as I do, and knowing that even though the Republican party is decidedly in the majority, I can not think that any legislation having as its object such an intolerable purpose as is openly expressed in this bill can or ever will be enacted into law. Regardless of political parties we are all men, and I am sure we are not so devoid of reason or a sense of right as to ever seriously consider such "firebrand" legislation to which the people of the section against which it is aimed would not patiently submit, and against which decency and justice would compel people of all sections, regardless of creed or party, to vigorously protest. [Applause.]

If this bill should become a law, the representation in this House for the State of Georgia would be reduced from 11 to 6 Representatives. This would be depriving that State of 5 of its Representatives. The reduction as proposed by this bill would reduce the representation of Alabama from 9 to 5; Arkansas, from 7 to 5; Florida, from 3 to 2; Louisiana, from 7 to 4; Mississippi, from 8 to 3; North Carolina, from 10 to 7; South Carolina, from 7 to 3; Tennessee, from 10 to 8; and Virginia from 10 to 7.

If this proposed reduction was made it would mean that a total of 32 southern Congressmen would lose their seats in this House, and the 10 Southern States just named would have their representation reduced from 82 to 50 Members, or a total loss of 32 Representatives, and for no other reason than these 10 sovereign States have dared to exercise their rights, as guaranteed to every State of the Union under the Constitution. These 10 Southern States are to be chastised and the people thereof humiliated and trodden upon for doing what they had an absolute right to do. The gentleman from New York, and the few who agree with him in this unjust measure, hardly know the danger of the "dynamite" with which they are playing. God forbid that men who are blind to justice, empty of love for the white race, and who disregard constitutional rights should ever get control of the Congress of the United States, for not until then will any State suffer humiliation because it dares to purify the ballot and morals in its borders by prescribing certain restrictions as to who shall be permitted to exercise the right of franchise and to control its government.

The Constitution of the United States provides in section 2, Article I, that "the electors (for Members of the House of Representatives) in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature." Representation in the House of Representatives is not based upon the number of voters in a State, but upon the population.

From time to time, out of a fit of political desperation, the country is called upon to witness the spasmodic efforts of some gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber to destroy white supremacy in the South, but while white men live in the South it will never be done. These gentlemen who pretend that they would foist "force bills" and "reduction of representation bills" upon the Southern States hardly mean it. I can not believe they are sincere in it.

Some of these gentlemen, thank God there are not many of them, and I hope the day is not far distant when none of them will be here, insist that the negro be given in the South all kinds of equal rights—political, social, and otherwise. If anyone thinks he can drive us to it he is mistaken and does not know the "folks" he is dealing with. Notwithstanding the fact that these gentlemen are insisting on these rights for the negro in the South, yet they always see to it that he is not appointed to any federal office in the North, and that he is not elected in the North to any of the important offices.

Just remember one thing, my friends, that for the very reason you do not want him in office over you, and in power over you, is the same reason that white people in the South will not tolerate it. People of the same race, of the same blood, are pretty much the same in spirit and in sentiment wherever you find them, and I can not believe that the white people in the districts represented by gentlemen claiming such rights for the negro approve of the conduct of their Representatives in this regard.

This bill to almost deprive the Southern States of representation here in the "House of our Fathers" is the latest exhibition of "long-distance brotherly love" for the negro, and it is about the worst bill of its kind that has ever been aimed at the South. The gentleman from New York would destroy at one stroke all the rights of the Southern States to regulate their own elections and place them in the position of elective serfs at the feet of tyrannical legislation, born of bitterness, hate, and political selfishness. The membership of the House, under the enforcement of this proposed legislation, would be reduced from 391 to 359 Members.

The reductions would be made in States having Democratic delegations, and if made, drunk with power and crazed with the crime committed, would not these "South-hating" gentlemen then use the increased majority resulting to them by reason of this reduction undertake and accomplish even more shameful acts against States that would then be almost entirely in their power and at their mercy?

The gentleman from New York, out of a pretended spirit of fairness that is hard to account for, very kindly adds to this "firebrand" bill of his a proviso, that when the dismantled Southern States shall repent of their desire to govern themselves and shall conduct their elections in entire accordance with the specifications of certain designing Republican politicians, they may again have their full share of representation to which they are entitled. I wish to suggest that such is a pretty big concession to be made by Democratic States, and I hope the gentleman from New York will hold his breath until such is acceded to by us.

He further provides in this obnoxious bill of his that unless the legislatures of the specified States shall make provision for elections in accordance with this new plan all the Representatives generously allowed them shall be elected from the States at large.

Mr. Chairman, the author of this bill is a serious man and in no sense a humorist; otherwise we might conclude that he was trying to add to the "gayety of nations" and vary the monotony of Congress.

Does the gentleman from New York really mean what he says in this bill of his? Would he, as a man of the white race, the purest and noblest race known to history, be a party to a fiendish scheme that would place black heels on white necks in the South? Oh, my friends, I am afraid the gentleman has never broadened up enough to realize that there is even a part of the world other than the State of New York.

Through this foul proposition he would reestablish the dark days of reconstruction, would demolish the supremacy of the descendants of the noblest race of men that ever walked the globe, and put in its place a blistering government of mongrel type, in which the negro would hold the balance of power.

Sir, I deeply and sincerely regret all political movements of this character. They tend to reopen old sectional wounds which we of the present generation are striving to forget. It is a fatal mistake to inject into the present era of good feeling between the sections anything tending to keep alive the enmities engendered by the war. As a son of a private confederate soldier who fought his best as long as the war lasted and turned his sword into a plowshare when the war had closed and has nobly done his duty as he saw it, I revere next to heaven itself the sacred cause of the South. I honor as I honor nothing else on earth the memories of our southern ancestors; but I fully realize, nevertheless, that no good result can come from perpetuating any of the bitterness of the past and that the sooner sectional animosities are entirely forgotten the better will be the fate of every portion of our united country. I am sure I speak the sentiment of the southern people when I declare that they would be most grateful if the gentleman from New York and those who agree with him and seek distinction through bills such as he stands sponsor for would leave them alone to settle the race question and all other local problems that confront them.

The southern people are honest, courageous, noble in every particular, and though they lost practically everything they had in the bitter conflict of the sixties, they have put aside all that and have met and overcome misfortune in a manner that established a new record in the world. They thank God that power has been given them to so splendidly rebuild our fair country; that they have been endowed with wisdom and courage to meet and master all local problems, including the race question; and they only ask to be let alone, that they may work out the solution of this vexatious problem, so vital to our moral, political, and social institutions.

It is most deeply to be regretted, Mr. Chairman, that legislation such as that proposed in this bill has the backing of a single Member. I believe that every fair-minded person, every one of evenly balanced judgment, every one who can correctly gauge cause and effect, every broad-minded patriot, would grieve to see such an enactment. It would set back for scores of years the hands on the dial of southern progress; it would bring about the reinstatement of the social and political chaos that reigned in the South when the ballot was polluted by the Republican bayonet; it would rekindle all the fires of racial prejudice, which are now almost extinguished; it would cause constant and horrible clashes between the negro and the white race in the South; it would again plunge into the abyss of despair the fairest hopes of peace and harmony between the sections.

I am happy to say that the wounds from which the South bled after four years of strife, followed by other years of suffering, have so well closed that nearly all the scars have faded. The indescribably horrible rule of the reconstruction era was happily succeeded by safe and sane legislation in the interest of civic order and the revival of industry and commerce. Capital which had shunned territory where investment had been considered hazardous came rushing to the South as soon as it was clearly shown that her true sons had resumed their sway, and that law and order were in command. Industry unfolded her potent wings and gave employment to thousands. The husbandman's plow again furrowed the grateful earth which yielded abundant harvest. The South started on that career of recuperation which has become the wonder of all the world, and she now holds out promise of a future in comparison with which the prosperity of bygone years will fade into pale insignificance. [Applause.]

Into this state of peace and order Republican politicians, selfish for their own advancement, would throw the apple of discord; for let me tell you, sir, horrible discord and "confusion worse confounded" would result from the passage of this bill. The population of the Southern States is about 25,000,000. Of these about 9,000,000, or 30 per cent, are negroes. If the illiterate and purchasable negroes were allowed to vote, they would become facile tools in the hands of designing politicians. The rule of this unholy combination will never again be permitted.

Mr. Chairman, I protest against this attempt at discord. My people, the southern white people as a whole, have done their full duty by the negro. They have done more than ought to have been expected of them; they have heavily taxed themselves for his education; they have given him every opportunity to earn a respectable livelihood; they have given him justice in the courts; they are gladly giving him aid along his journey toward self-respect and self-reliance. The negro in the South has all the rights of citizenship save only that of suffrage, and he has that except as it is denied to all under qualifications set forth in the law of certain States.

The Anglo-Saxon is the only race that has thus far successfully solved the great problem of self-government. For this great task that race had centuries of preparation. From Magna Charta to the Declaration of Independence much precious blood was shed to establish government by the people.

From the foundation of our Government down to the present day the people have settled every question that presented itself, and to-day this country is the most shining example in all the world of a well-balanced, well-established democratic Republic. In our whole national existence there is but one period—the reconstruction era—when the negro was injected into our career as a controlling factor. I want to partially rehearse the story of this era with the hope that its rehearsal will prove an antidote to the poison contained in this bill, and other bills like it, and a preventive against such vicious legislation in the future.

When Lee laid down his sword at Appomattox and Grant bade the confederate soldiers to take their horses home for use "in the spring plowing," the hearts of the southern people were filled with gratitude to the generous northern chieftain; those soldiers went home to rebuild their shattered homesteads and again make fruitful the fields laid waste by war. All was going well when, like a thunderbolt from a clear sky, came the reconstruction acts of 1867, and a blight fell upon the land. Four million ignorant negroes from whom the gyves of bondage had just been struck—as ignorant of government as their ancestors in Africa—were invested with the right of suffrage, and the intelligent white people of the South were excluded from the public councils. Every Southern State was put under military rule and soldiers were made the judges of the qualifications of voters. Negroes were election officers; negroes controlled the constitutional conventions, directed by carpetbaggers and scalawags, who were worse than negroes; fraud, theft, rapine, and murder were the order of the day. Those acts of March 2, March 23, and July 19, 1867, plunged the Southern States into misery on which the plunderers feasted and fattened. Under these laws the negroes and their allies obtained control of every one of the reconstructed States except Virginia and West Virginia.

The negroes were angels by comparison with their allies. Southern men know full well that the negroes of those wretched years were but the tools of the designing hordes of plunderers who plied their iniquitous trades under the ægis of governmental protection.

As a lesson and as a warning to those who would inflict "force bills" upon the South, let me mention a few suggestive facts of past history. Under these iniquitous reconstruction election laws in Alabama there was a heavy penalty imposed upon anyone who challenged a vote; in South Carolina the commissioners of election (carpetbaggers) could fix the places of election at any time, even on the day of election, and could keep the ballot boxes ten days after the election before declaring the result; in Georgia no registration was required, no challenges were allowed, and there was the fullest opportunity to "repeat;" in Arkansas the courts were forbidden by law to interfere with the partisan appointees who conducted the election; in Louisiana the governor appointed the registrars, the registrars appointed the supervisors, who were not required to live in the parish where they served, and, in fact, many of them went from New Orleans to serve in parishes where they had never set foot before and sometimes returned themselves elected to office.

These are but a few illustrations of those horrible laws. Legislative bodies in the South, composed of men who were not taxpayers, and many of whom could not read or write, robbed their States of credit abroad while they plundered the citizens at home. In South Carolina alone there were 200 trial justices who could not write. As a result of this reign of ignorance and crime, there were in the Forty-first Congress, for instance, from March 4, 1871, to March 4, 1873, from the 12 Southern States 22 Republican and 2 Democratic United States Senators and 48 Republican and 13 Democratic Representatives.

As further enlightenment as to the legacies left by the selfish political gluttons of that era: In Alabama the state debt in six years was increased $17,000,000. In North Carolina in three years the state debt was increased $24,000,000, while the assessed valuation of taxable properties was only $120,000,000, and $14,000,000 were issued in bonds for railroads not one of which was ever built. In South Carolina, after the state debt had become so big that even the carpetbaggers repudiated part of it, that State threw off the yoke before they had a chance to make a fresh start, but was still left with a debt of $6,000,000. In one year, 1872, the printing expenses of South Carolina ran up to $450,000, which was a great deal more than the similar expenses for twenty-five years previous to reconstruction.

During the two years' administration of Governor Bullock in Georgia the state debt was increased by $6,623,000, and bonds were issued amounting to nearly $6,000,000. Florida's debt was increased $1,000,000, besides a bond issue of $4,000,000. In Tennessee a bonded debt was created of more than $16,000,000. In Arkansas, in the six years between 1868 and 1874, the average annual expenses of the state government, exclusive of schools and public buildings, were four times as much as in the succeeding six years of Democratic administration. In Mississippi the debt ran up in six years from practically nothing to several millions; the tax rate in 1871 was four times as high as under Democratic régime; in 1873 eight and half times; in 1874 fourteen times as high and 64,000,000 acres of land, one-fifth the area of the State, were forfeited for taxes. At the beginning of the reconstruction era Texas had scarcely any state debt, but after four years of carpetbag rule she owed about $4,500,000. When the carpetbaggers took possession of Louisiana the state tax was 3¼ mills on the dollar, but by 1872 it was 21½ mills, and the state debt had jumped in that time from $8,700,000 to $48,000,000.

Facts like these, Mr. Chairman, could be continued almost indefinitely. As to these conditions, let me call to witness a distinguished Massachusetts Republican, member of the Massachusetts Historical Society, a historian of international repute, Dr. James Ford Rhodes. In his History of the United States, published in 1906, Doctor Rhodes says:

> No large policy in our country has ever been so conspicuous a failure as that of forcing universal negro suffrage upon the South.
> The scheme of reconstruction pandered to the ignorant negroes, the knavish white natives, and the vulturous adventurers who flocked from the North. Intelligence and property stood bound and helpless under negro carpetbag rule. And the fact that such governments continued to exist, were supported by federal authority, and defended by prominent Republicans, has a share in the demoralization of politics at the North.

Again, says this fair-minded Republican, in the same volume:

> The negro's political activity is rarely of a nature to identify him with any movement on a high plane; he takes no part in civil service or tariff reform; he was not a factor in the contest for honest money; he is seldom, if ever, heard in advocacy of pure municipal government; and for him good-government associations have no attraction. He is greedy for office and emolument; it is for this reason that he arrogantly asserts his right to recognition; and he has had remarkable success in securing offices under the Federal Government. In a word he has been politically a failure and he could not have been otherwise. In spite of all the warnings of science and of political experience, he was started at the top and, as is the fate of most such unfortunates, he fell to the bottom. (Rhodes's History of the United States, vol. 7, p. 168, et seq.)

The only rights, Mr. Chairman, that the negro has received that have been worth anything to him have been accorded him in the South. A bulletin recently issued by the Bureau of Education states that "It is estimated that at the present time about 30 per cent of the public-school funds in the South is for the support of the schools for negroes." And remember that practically all of this fund comes from the taxation of whites. According to the same publication, at least $165,000,000 has been expended by the Southern States since 1870 to support common schools for the colored race. Within the lines of demarcation prescribed by social rules the negro in the South is absolutely untrammeled. We will not give him social equality; we will not allow him political supremacy; we will help him through any other channels to the best advancement of which he is capable.

The negro would not be so terribly anxious to vote if he were not encouraged so to do by these periodic force bills in Congress, and the foolish, false doctrines of scheming Republican politicians. Real students of the situation, either North or South, know this. In the Political Science Quarterly for March, 1905, Francis Gordon Caffey, in an article entitled "Suffrage limitations at the South," declares that "It is a mistaken assumption of fact to say that in temper the negroes as a body are anxious to vote."

In comparing the election laws of the South and New England, Mr. Caffey further says:

> The policy of rewarding those who learn to read and write by giving them a vote has been permitted to remain in operation in New England for many years as an influence tending to reduce illiteracy. Now, when the South, still so far away from victory in the great war it is making against illiteracy, offers the same premium to her citizens as New England has long and with profit offered, it is proposed either to punish her by loss of influence in Congress and in the electoral college, or to force her, in order to retain her proportionate representation, to restore to ignorance the political power which she desires to offer as a premium upon intelligence, and this alternative is to be imposed upon her because, in order to establish an educational qualification, it was necessary for her, as it was necessary in 1857 for Massachusetts, to preserve the rights of those illiterate persons who already had the suffrage.

This able writer was discussing the force bill presented by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], who seems to have realized the folly of it, and hence has abandoned it, but what he says is equally applicable to the bill of the gentleman from New York. The real object of all such bills is to reinstate negro supremacy in the Southern States and perpetuate the domination of the Republican party in Congress. No one thinks for a moment that the Republican party is animated by altruistic sentiment, or that it aims at abstract political justice. The late Thomas B. Reed on one occasion, with a cynicism so frank as to be almost pleasing, declared that the Republican party was perfectly willing to let the Southern States do as they pleased in the regulation of their affairs, but that it wanted "the votes that belong to us in the House of Representatives." These politicians do not "care a rap" for the rights of the negro, politically or otherwise, but they want to use him as a "means unto an end" in their own political life.

There is absolutely nothing but unadulterated demagogism in all this agitation in favor of force bills. The time for such legislation, if it ever existed, is long past. They that urge it are far behind the age. They have failed to learn the lesson of the last three decades. To them the renaissance of the South is a sealed book. The "Godspeed!" heard on every side, to cheer on the South in its new career of prominence in the Nation, finds them deaf to its call. But measures such as they propose will not avail against the calm determination of the southern people to work out their glorious destiny unhampered and unchecked by such influences. Conscious of her might, the South will move forward in her civic life. She is thoroughly alive to her great opportunities and advantages. She knows her superiority in coast line and navigable rivers, in the distribution of rainfall, in soil and climate, in agricultural possibilities, in quantity and variety of minerals, and most of all, in her splendid contribution to the dominant race of the world. Dealing fairly, honestly, and liberally with all men, she will not forget where her rights are or how to maintain them, but she will press ever forward toward the mark of her high calling in the perfection and fulfillment of her own destiny and in the betterment of all mankind. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the few remarks that I shall make on this bill will be made entirely in a sympathetic vein, at least not in the spirit of criticism, because my service here and my knowledge of the subject is not of long enough standing to weigh against the judgment of the men representing both sides of this House on this industrious and important committee. I make these few observations, however, in the full realization of what was stated by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] that the postal service was very close to every American citizen, closer possibly than any other branch of the governmental service, and that it had grown wonderfully in the last few years, and is still growing at such a rate that necessarily there are inconsistencies and inequalities as the result of that tremendous expansion of the postal service; and in the further ardent hope that the statement made by that gentleman and other members of the committee that a complete and thorough reorganization after a scientific investigation of the postal service was about to be undertaken.

The rural carriers have friends in this House, and I am glad they have. If the rural service has grown to such a remarkable extent in the brief time it has been in existence, it has demonstrated by that fact not only its usefulness to the American public, but the insistent and ardent demand of the American public for such service.

I believe that the mail carriers are underpaid and that their pay should be increased to a proper compensation for the ability and fidelity required of men in that service. I am not one of those who are in fear of the deficit in the postal service. I do not believe that the American people intend the postal service to be put on a basis of profit, or even that they intend that it be on a self-sustaining basis. I look upon the alleged profit in the first-class mail department of the postal service as not being a profit legitimately belonging to that branch of the service. If it did it should be eliminated. If it be not the result of a liberality in the rate on the second and third and fourth class mail matter, then there should be no profit in the first-class service. If the second-class liberality has any legitimate effect it should be to increase the first-class mail, and having done so the profit should not be credited to the first-class mail, but should be distributed through the other branches of the service; so that in no case should there be a profit in the postal service. Nor am I concerned that as a matter of bookkeeping there should be credited to the postal department the free mail now carried for the other departments of the Government, whether they be legislative or executive. It would be no more than a matter of bookkeeping if it were done, and if it can be done and thus reduce this apparent or alleged deficit, it should certainly be done in the reorganization scheme.

The Department of Commerce and Labor, the Department of Agriculture, and many of the departments of the Government have grown enormously in the last decade, not only in their actual work carried on at the seat of government, but in their contact with the individual citizen of the Nation. The use of the Postal Department should be considered as one of the agencies of their development.

The Government, through its various departments and bureaus, is collecting large amounts of valuable information bearing on every industry and occupation. This is done at the expense of the Nation, and its usefulness consists solely in having it widely distributed among the people. This necessitates an increasing use of the Postal Department for free public mail.

No American citizen complains of that, nor desires to see a curtailment of the proper use of the Postal Department for such purpose either by the executive departments or by Congress.

Perhaps on a thorough investigation and reorganization of the department the deficit will disappear.

But the existence of a deficit, or alleged deficit, should not be made a motive or an excuse for economy which would reduce the efficiency or restrict the further profitable extension of the postal service. It is clear that the employees of the Post-Office Department itself are not to blame for any alleged deficit. If the city carriers under the present cost of living in the cities are paid no more than the average wage for that class of skill and intelligence in their lines of business in those communities, then there is no charge to be laid at their door of having caused this deficit. In its reorganization I should like to see a change made in that respect. I asked the chairman of the committee this morning if it did not require under the present law five years to reach the maximum grade of $1,100.

I still understand it does; that the first year is $600, the second $800, the third $900, the fourth $1,000, and the fifth $1,100; differing from the law as it was a few years ago. I believe that under the present cost of living the increase ought to be automatic, for good behavior and good record, up to $1,200, and that it is not only a mistake in the service, but it puts an improper power in the hands of the postmaster to allow the designation of promotion above the $1,100 grade to be made solely on his recommendation. I believe this is true, also, of the postal clerks; that they should increase automatically, and I believe that both the carriers and the clerks should be paid on the 48-hour-a-week working basis. I should like to see, also, a change in the regulations that permit a postmaster to reduce the annual salary of a carrier for an infraction of rules. This seems to me an improper and dangerous power, aside from its possible political abuse. A breach of the rules which is not serious enough to justify discharge, ordinarily may be sufficiently punished by a lay off. I believe, as I indicated in my questions to the chairman of the committee this morning, that this bill does not go far enough in providing the new clerks to recruit the lower grades of the service. The clerks have the right to believe, as many of them do believe, that there will not be enough new clerks to provide for resignation, death, and promotion, and that they will be compelled in many offices to work nine and ten and eleven hours of service many days.

I have full realization of the fact that the mail can not be handled in fixed hours in all the offices all over the Nation, but I believe that a forty-eight-hour working basis is possible, and is consistent with economy and efficiency.

I believe that many reforms could be made in the Railway Mail Service, one of the services which expedites more than all others the assortment and delivery of the mail, one of the services that requires the highest degree of skill and faith, and which has hanging over it at all times the highest degree of personal danger.

Never a train goes into the ditch but that the telegraph reports say the mail clerk was one of the killed or injured. Every time a mail clerk goes out upon his run he takes his life in his hands. He not only does that, but every time we lose a mail clerk from the government service we lose a trained and skilled man. I believe every precaution of public safety should be put upon the railroads that carry these mail cars in order to compel them to provide for the safety of the mail clerks. I believe the sanitary conditions of those cars should be raised to the level of the sanitary conditions of the post-offices in the cities where the clerks work. I believe the mail clerks should have their traveling expenses, and I do not believe that the $250,000 provided in this bill will cover that item.

I am going to vote for an amendment to increase this amount. I am going to vote for adequate pay for the mail carriers, and I am going to vote for more postal clerks than this bill provides. [Applause.]

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—INCREASED COST OF LIVING.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in the morning papers there are various statements about what occurred in the meeting of the committee charged with the investigation of the prices of commodities on yesterday, most of which have no foundation in fact. By reason of these unwarranted statements, which have been published to the country, and as a result of which the minority members of that committee may be put in a false attitude before the country, I wish to ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments while I make a statement concerning these rumors and concerning the attitude of the minority members of that committee.

I read from the Washington Times of yesterday evening:

FOOD-TRUST PROBE WILL NOT BE OPEN.

The Senate cost-of-living committee will hold to the plan that its efforts to fix the responsibility for the present high prices of foodstuffs and clothing will be made virtually behind closed doors.

I want to say, Mr. President, that there has been no action on the part of the committee upon this question at any meeting at which I was present, and I think I have been present every minute when the committee as a whole has been in session. Of course, I do not know what may have been determined by the majority members of the committee in executive session. I have not heard that any such session had been held, and I do not presume that any such has been held.

Mr. LODGE. None has been held, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator says none has been held. Speaking for myself, and I think I speak for the minority members of that committee, we have not assented to an investigation behind closed doors, and we do not propose to assent to any such procedure. We may be overruled, but we will not consent to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am sure the Senator is satisfied in his own mind that a majority of the committee has had no such purpose in view.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not heard of any such purpose of the majority. I am simply reading a statement that seems to have got currency in the press of the country that the investigation was to be made behind closed doors and the committee had so decided.

Mr. GALLINGER. There has been no conference on that matter on the part of the majority members, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not think there had been. Reading from the Times further:

The methods of procedure in the investigation will be to depend almost solely on evidence and data to be furnished by government officials and employees. The members of the committee this morning decided that the data upon which they will draw and which will fix the responsibility they seek will come through government channels.

Secretary of Agriculture Wilson and Commissioner of Labor Neill, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, this morning presented to the committee their ideas as to the methods which they think should be employed to make the investigation. In Senator LODGE'S opinion the two departments represented this morning can provide practically all the data which will be needed to locate the blame for prevailing prices.

Again, Mr. President, that statement as to the attitude of the committee, so far as any action it has taken up to this time is concerned, is not warranted by the facts. As a matter of fact, there has been no decision on the part of the committee that the committee will content itself for the information which it desires with investigations made by experts or officials of the departments. I repeat, there has been no decision by the committee to that effect. There have been statements that this department-gathered data would be very valuable, that probably we could get a large part of the information desired through these department investigations, but there has been no action looking to thus limiting our sources of investigation.

On behalf of myself and the minority members upon that committee, I want to make it plain that we do not assent to the proposition that an investigation made through the departments will be adequate to meet the needs of the situation or the demands of this inquiry.

Again, Mr. President, I read from the Washington Post reportorial column this morning:

BLAME TRUSTS FOR PRICES—DEMOCRATS OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE CENSURE REPUBLICANS.

Democratic members of the Senate committee to investigate the high cost of food products yesterday gave evidence of their purpose to attempt to show that the increase is due to trusts, and that, inasmuch as they believe the Republican party is responsible for trusts, the party in power is responsible for high food products.

Yesterday Secretary Wilson and Commissioner of Labor Neill were before Mr. LODGE'S investigating committee to give an outline as to the character of information that might be expected from their departments. Questioning along this line was being conducted by Mr. LODGE when Senators CLARKE of Arkansas and SIMMONS branched off into questions intended to develop the trust idea.

The Republicans opposed this at the present stage of the inquiry, but the Democratic members persisted. Senator LODGE was quoted later in the day as saying this course on the part of the Democrats would not be permitted.

Of course I do not know what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said the latter part of the day after the committee adjourned, but I do know, Mr. President, that nothing occurred in the committee to justify that comment upon the conduct of the Democratic Senators on the committee.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to say to the Senator that that thing he has read is absolutely false. I never made any statement of the sort, and, as the Senator well knows, nothing of that kind occurred.

Mr. SIMMONS. Absolutely nothing of that kind occurred, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. The whole thing is falsehood from beginning to end.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to read further, Mr. President, to show to what extent this effort to put the Democratic members of the committee in the attitude of being obstructionists is being made by a part of the press of the country. Here is an editorial from the Washington Post of this morning:

POLITICS IN SENATE FOOD PROBE.

Leading questions put to Secretary Wilson and Labor Commissioner Neill by the Democratic members of the Lodge food inquiry committee precipitated a clash along political lines at the very outset. The Republican members charged the minority with seeking political advantage by going into the trust question prematurely, whereas Messrs. Wilson and Neill had been called merely to indicate what department data on the food question the committee might expect from them. This technical objection to their line of inquiry having no weight with the Democrats, the Republican majority called a halt, as the news filtered out through the closed doors.

Mr. President, I want to say that the meeting of the committee yesterday was most harmonious. The Senators referred to, representing the minority, did ask the Secretary of Agriculture and Commissioner Neill quite a number of questions, but those questions were directed, not with a view of putting the blame of high prices upon the trusts, or upon the tariff, or upon the retailer, or upon the wholesaler, or upon the manufacturer, or anybody else, but, so far as those asked by myself—and I think I can say that for my colleague, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]—for the purpose of eliciting facts pertinent to inquiries directed by Congress to be made and for the purpose of showing that an investigation which confined itself to inquiries made through the departments of the Government would be too restricted.

No objection was made to any question asked either by the Senators from Arkansas and Alabama, or myself. No member of the committee intimated that our inquiries were not pertinent and in the proper line to elicit information pertinent to the inquiry.

Now, Mr. President, I had just as well take advantage of this opportunity to state in a general way my position and, I think, the position of the minority members of the committee, with reference to this investigation. I am certain that we have no desire to give it any partisan color. It is not our view or purpose to fix the blame on the trusts, or on the tariff, or on the retailer, or on the wholesaler further than the evidence may saddle it on them.

But we do desire, Mr. President, that if the evidence discloses that the exorbitant and artificial prices under which the people of this country are groaning are the result of any one of these causes, the blame should be properly fixed.

I believe, Mr. President, and I am sure my Democratic colleagues agree with me, that this investigation ought to be thorough, searching, exhaustive, and impartial, whether the result shall advance the cause of one party or the other, whether it shall put the blame upon one interest or another, on one organization or another, the truth should be elicited. I do not believe that anything short of this kind of an investigation will satisfy the country.

With reference to the suggestion that we can get all needed data through the departments of the Government, I want to say that already gathered by the government departments, especially that in the possession of the Departments of Agriculture and of Commerce and Labor, and that which the committee may be able to secure through the experts of these departments, acting under its direction, will be very valuable. But an investigation confined in the main to information gathered through these departments, in my opinion, will not meet the situation or the just expectations of the people with reference to this investigation.

I believe, and I think it is the opinion of the country at large, that the prices of most of the commodities which enter into daily use and consumption are largely controlled by organized capital or interests, and through these organizations not only are the prices paid by the middleman and the retailer, but the prices at which they sell what they buy are fixed and maintained. The result of this system is to destroy competition, and thereby arbitrarily and extortionately, as the experience of the country shows, advance prices.

Any investigation, Mr. President, which does not inquire into the methods and devices by which this result is accomplished as well as the effect of these methods upon prices would be incomplete, unsatisfactory, and, in my opinion, impotent.

The purpose of the questions propounded by the minority members of the committee on yesterday at the meeting of the committee was largely to show that satisfactory information along these lines could not be secured through investigations conducted by department experts, however expert or skillful they might be as investigators. In my opinion, and I think I speak the sentiment of my Democratic colleagues on the committee, this can only be effectively done by rigid oral cross-examination of the responsible agents of these organizations.

Mr. President, yesterday when we were making these inquiries, it was practically admitted by the Secretary of Agriculture that his department could not make a thorough, satisfactory probe of high prices, because while his agents could ask questions, they could not compel answers; and, of course, had no power to verify answers by cross-examination of the witness. He stated positively, in response to an inquiry asked him, I think, by myself, and I think Mr. Commissioner Neill made the same statement, that there was no machinery in either of their departments which would allow them to adequately probe into the methods and devices by which these organized interests fix the prices of the things they sell and the price at which the purchaser sells, and in that way suppress competition and maintain artificial prices. I think that is apparent without the statements and admissions of the Secretary of Agriculture or the Commissioner of Labor.

I believe, Mr. President, that the manufacturers, the wholesalers, the jobbers, the retailers, the managers of the packers, cold-storage firms, and so forth, ought to be brought before the committee and subjected to a searching and scrutinizing examination and cross-examination with a view of eliciting the truth. An investigation which does not apply the test of cross-examination to ascertain facts as to prices and methods by which artificial prices, both of purchase and sale, are fixed and maintained, whether through the organizations of interests or of trusts or of tariff, will fail, in my judgment, of what is expected of this committee, and personally I want to say that I would feel little interest in such a restricted and inadequate investigation.

Mr. President, I have asked the attention of the Senate this morning as long as I have because I thought that in view of the unwarranted statements that have gone out through the press, giving color to the idea that in the outset an attempt was to be made to influence, if not coerce, the Democratic members in the course they shall pursue in this investigation by creating a public sentiment that they were acting as obstructionists and trying to lead the investigation into channels of politics, a clear, distinct statement of the facts and of the views of the minority members of the committee should be made. In making that statement I want it understood that I am not complaining of the committee or its chairman. I do not mean to intimate that he has given out any of this information. I do not know where it has come from. I believe that the larger part of it has been purely manufactured.

Mr. President, the press comments of this morning, those which I have referred to and others, indicate a purpose on the part of certain journals to try to influence or coerce the investigation away from the trusts and the tariff. The blame should not be placed where it does not belong; but if the object of this investigation is to clear the trusts and the tariff and fix the blame upon the retailer, the wholesaler, and the farmer, then I should feel like washing my hands of it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the statements which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has read from the Washington Post of this morning were misrepresentations as complete as I think it is possible to make misrepresentations. The committee of inquiry has had two meetings, and, so far as I am aware, there has been no difference of opinion developed between the minority and majority of the committee or between one party and the other party. The purpose of the committee, as I understand it, is to get at the facts, no matter whom they hurt or whom they help, and to get those facts as rapidly before Congress and the country as it is possible. The statement of the Senator from North Carolina that the meetings have been entirely harmonious is absolutely true, and there have been no meetings except the meetings of the committee.

At the first meeting the committee agreed to instruct the chairman to call the Secretary of Agriculture and to call the Commissioner of Labor, in order that we might find out from them what material they had in their possession which would aid us in the inquiry. The committee also instructed the chairman to request the Secretary of State to get reports as rapidly as possible from our ambassadors, ministers, and consuls abroad as to prices at the present time in foreign markets, taking, of course, certain representative markets; and, so far as was possible, to get us the prices for the preceding decade. The chairman, of course, carried out the instructions of the committee.

The Secretary of Agriculture and the Commissioner of Labor came before the committee yesterday, and the committee heard from them in a general way what material they had. I think we all agreed to the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] that what we wanted to get at first was to ascertain what information the Government had, and then to supply the deficiency ourselves in such a manner as might seem best when the situation was developed.

Mr. President, I have only this to add to what the Senator from North Carolina has said. So far as I am personally concerned—and I think I speak for the entire committee—our purpose is to get at the facts without fear and without favor; to bring the facts, so far as possible, before Congress; and to enable the country to understand what the facts show as to the causes of the advance in prices, no matter what those causes may prove to be.

But it is also to be remembered that it is the desire of the committee to get this information as rapidly as possible. The committee does not desire to drag out its time in useless inquiries which will result in nothing. They want to get something before the people of the country, and to get it before them now. They do not want to enter on an inquiry which will take two or three years before any result is reached. They want to get results at the earliest possible moment. They already appreciate the difficulties of the inquiry; they appreciate the extent of the field; and they are trying as rapidly as they can to organize the inquiry, so that it shall produce results at the earliest possible moment. There is no intention, so far as I am aware, on the part of any member of the committee to make the investigation either partisan or political. They have been charged with an inquiry into facts; and the facts they will try to bring before the Congress and the country at the earliest possible moment. Wherever we are satisfied that there is anybody—and I do not care who he may be or what he represents—who, in the opinion of the committee, can under examination and cross-examination furnish us with information as to the facts, he will be brought before the committee and examined.

But, Mr. President, the preliminary necessary to work intelligently is to lay out the work. We do not want to begin by duplicating a great mass of information; we want to find out if we can what we have got to start with, and then we shall know what is lacking; and the committee is at that point now. Their first action will be to frame lines of inquiry—that they hope to do at their meeting to-morrow—to mark out the lines of inquiry, and then answer those questions which they themselves put by the best possible information.

There was not only no obstruction of the minority such as was stated in the newspaper articles which were read, but, on the contrary, every member of the minority, so far as my observation went, was trying to do exactly what the rest of us were trying to do—to find out how we could get facts most certainly and most quickly.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the committee that the scope of their inquiry should be enlarged so as to deal with individual articles in this country, and particularly with oil, which sells in Oklahoma at 35 cents a barrel of 42 gallons, while the refined product in the way of gasoline sells for 20 cents a gallon in Washington.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Oklahoma will take the trouble to look over the resolution under which the committee was created, I think he will see that it does not need enlargement. It is one of the most extensive inquiries that I have ever seen projected, and it includes oil among the enumerated articles.

Mr. OWEN. That is already included, then?

Mr. LODGE. It includes some things which it would be simply impossible for any committee to determine within any reasonable time. I do not mean oil or a product like that, but rents have been included. To determine rents in this country would require an investigation which would take the whole force of the Government, and I think the Senator from Oklahoma, appreciating the economic importance of rents, would realize that at once—it would take the whole Government and any committee of this Senate a year or two to get at any general idea of rents throughout the country. It is the most complicated and difficult subject relative to which I know of no collected material, and it varies from one end of the country to the other. There are, however, a great many articles, like oil, which we can inquire into and find out about and discover the cause of the discrepancies which the Senator from Oklahoma has pointed out. That is exactly what the committee want to get at.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. OWEN. I ask that the amendment I have proposed to the pending bill may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of Senate bill 5876 and to insert:

From and after the passage of this act the Comptroller of the Currency shall set apart the annual tax on the circulation of the national banking associations of the United States as a special fund, to be designated the "bank depositors' guaranty fund," to be used by the comptroller for the immediate payment of the depositors of any national bank failing after the passage of this act. The net liquidated assets of any national bank of which the Comptroller of the Currency takes charge for the purpose of liquidation shall be deposited to the credit of the "bank depositors' guaranty fund" to the extent required to reimburse such fund any moneys advanced by such fund for the payment of the depositors of such bank. No deposit under contract, either directly or indirectly, to bear interest in excess of 4 per cent per annum on time deposit, or in excess of 2 per cent per annum on current account, shall be included in the insurance provided by this act, and no such deposit shall be paid out of the "bank depositors' guaranty fund."

That any state bank or trust company may have its deposits guaranteed by the "bank depositors' guaranty fund" upon an equitable system to be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency and approved by the President of the United States.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in offering a substitute for the postal savings-bank bill I do not do so under the belief that it will be adopted by the Senate, but for the purpose of calling attention to the importance of the subject-matter and because as a Democrat, believing in the doctrine laid down by the national Democratic convention, for one I should like to offer to the Senate at least an opportunity to conform to the proposal of the Democracy in its last national platform, which is as follows:

We pledge ourselves to legislation under which the national banks shall be required to establish a guaranty fund for the prompt payment of the depositors of any insolvent national bank, under an equitable system which should be available to all state banking institutions wishing to use it.

We favor a postal savings bank if the guaranteed bank can not be secured, and believe that it should be so constituted as to keep the deposited money in the communities where the depositors live.

The postal savings-bank bill has been amended in the committee and in the Senate so as to provide that the money shall be kept in the vicinity in which it is proposed these deposits shall be made, and unless it be amended to the contrary before its passage I should feel obliged to support the bill, because it appeals to my judgment as being practical and sound, as serving a great public use, and because I believe it to be constitutional; but, Mr. President, I see no reason why the postal savings-bank bill should not become a law, and at the same time the bank-guaranty plan be applied to the national banks of the United States under a system which would permit the state banks to be the beneficiaries of that plan.

There has been carried on in this country a deliberate propaganda against either the postal savings-bank proposition or any plan of mutual guaranty of bank deposits by the legislative committee of the American Bankers' Association. I hold in my hand their report of a meeting in Chicago in September, 1909, and, since they are deserving of a hearing, I shall read their objections. They say:

Resolved, That the American Bankers' Association is unalterably opposed to any arbitrary plan looking to the mutual guaranty of deposits either by a State or the Nation, for the following reasons:

1. It is a function outside of the State or National Government.
2. It is unsound in principle.
3. It is impracticable and misleading.
4. It is revolutionary in character.
5. It is subversive to sound economics.
6. It will lower the standard of our present banking system.
7. It is productive of and encourages bad banking.
8. It is a delusion that a tax upon the strong will prevent failures of the weak.
9. It discredits honesty, ability, and conservatism.
10. A loss suffered by one bank jeopardizes all banks.
11. The public must eventually pay the tax.
12. It will cause and not avert panics.

Resolved, That the American Bankers' Association is unalterably opposed to any arbitrary plan looking to the mutual guaranty of deposits either by a State or the Nation, believing it to be impracticable, unsound, and misleading, revolutionary in character, and subversive to sound economics, placing a tool in the hands of the unscrupulous and inexperienced for reckless banking, and knowing further that such a law weakens our banking system and jeopardizes the interests of the people.

Every hostile economic suggestion of these excellent gentlemen has been fully met by the Oklahoma banking system and demonstrated beyond reasonable doubt to be ludicrously untrue.

If there were any more adjectives available in the financial vocabulary they would have been doubtless used by these gentlemen, who, if they lived in the Indian country, would be called "Young-men-afraid-of-losing-their-deposits." When their verbal abuse is all summed up, the meaning of this opposition of the members of this legislative committee of the American Bankers' Association can, I think, be put in a few words, namely, that the very few citizens representing the larger banks of the country who practically dominate and control this association, believe that a guaranty plan making safe the deposits of the small banks will take away from the larger banks, to some measurable extent, a portion of their deposits. In my own judgment, they are in error as to this, because when the small banks become the depositories of the money which is now hidden in private hoards and which is not now in circulation in any bank, the increasing deposits passing into the hands of the small banks will, through the reserve system, contribute most substantially to the city banks. I think the accuracy of their criticism of this system is perhaps illustrated also by the accuracy of their prophecies. They say:

> Your committee's greatest work during the past year was that of preparing plans and assisting the committee of the savings bank section in defeating the numerous measures for the establishing of a postal savings banking system for the United States.
> We will not at this time discuss the various bills, as they are all dead (peace to their memory).

It seems that they are not all dead, but the spirit of the postal savings plan is very much alive in the pending bill. The present postal savings-bank bill is offered to the country in pursuance of the declaration of the Republican platform, pledging to the people of the United States a postal savings-bank bill. Both parties are committed to this proposition—the Democratic party in the alternative, the Republican party directly. I shall stand for this bill in the alternative, as proposed by the national Democracy, and I shall at the proper time propose this amendment to the bill, as well as offer it as a substitute for this bill.

Mr. President, on the 15th of January, 1908, I introduced a bill, Senate 3988, providing substantially for the above provision, for the purpose of preventing panics in the United States and for the purpose of giving stability to our national commerce. On the 14th of February, 1908, the State of Oklahoma passed an act establishing a bank depositors' guaranty fund for the state banks of Oklahoma, under which the national banks of that State might avail themselves of the bank depositors' guaranty fund by a plan to be agreed on between the authorities of the State and the Comptroller of the Currency. The Comptroller of the Currency held that no national bank could be authorized, under the law, to take advantage of the privileges offered by the State of Oklahoma, and the Attorney-General of the United States, in an opinion, sustained that view of the Comptroller of the Currency. In consequence, 73 national banks in Oklahoma in the first seventeen months of the operation of the Oklahoma bank depositors' guaranty law gave up their charters as national banks and became state banks of Oklahoma.

Up to date I understand that over 90 of the national banks have given up their charters in the State of Oklahoma. That is, over a fourth of these banks have retired in less than two years.

Are you prepared to let the national banking system in Oklahoma lose further prestige by refusing the remedy I propose?

The actual operation of the bank depositors' guaranty fund has been the most brilliant answer to every hostile prophecy and the most triumphant reply to every critic of the system. The Oklahoma statute was drawn with great care, with the active assistance and cooperation of many of the leading bankers of that State.

Every reasonable safeguard was provided to give the Oklahoma banks the greatest security and stability possible. For example, the persons organizing a bank were subject as individuals to the approval of the bank commissioner of the State, who required such persons to be men of good character and of good precedents, and free from the suspicion of engaging in the banking business for speculative purposes.

A double liability was imposed upon stockholders.

The capital was required to be fully paid.

The bank was not permitted to receive money on deposit in excess of ten times the amount of its paid-up capital and surplus, but provided for increase of capital in that event to correspond with increase of deposits.

It was forbidden to pay interest on deposits in excess of a rate to be fixed from time to time by the bank commissioner, who fixed a low rate not exceeding 4 per cent on time deposits and a lower rate on current accounts.

Real estate loans in excess of 20 per cent of the aggregate loan of such banks was forbidden.

The bank commissioner was authorized to require the increase of the bank's capital or surplus to prevent an excess of the bank's deposits of over ten times its capital and surplus.

The active bank officers were forbidden to lend the money of the bank to themselves.

The bank was forbidden to employ its moneys in trade or commerce, to buy the stock of other banks, or to make loans on its own capital stock.

The banks were required to carry a reserve of from 20 per cent in towns of 2,500 or less to 25 per cent in towns exceeding 2,500 inhabitants.

Savings associations were required to keep 10 per cent of their deposits on hand in cash and 10 per cent additional in bonds of the United States, or state, county, or municipal bonds of the State of Oklahoma worth not less than par.

The total liabilities to any bank of any person, company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of such company the liabilities of the several members thereof, were forbidden in excess of 20 per cent of the capital stock actually paid in.

Banks in an insolvent condition were forbidden to receive deposits.

Suitable penalties were provided for any false report or improper conduct.

Full publicity was required.

Frequent reports and examinations were provided.

Overdrafts were forbidden, the officer of the bank allowing the same to be personally liable.

Preference to any depositor or creditor by pledging the assets of the bank as collateral security was forbidden.

Habitual borrowing for the purpose of reloaning was placed under control.

The immediate replacement of an impaired capital was provided.

A bank depositors' guaranty fund was provided, to reach in twenty years an equivalent of 5 per cent of the average deposits of the banks, the guaranty fund to equal 1 per cent of the deposits for the first year and a sum equal to one-twentieth of such 5 per cent, or one-fourth of 1 per cent of such deposits per annum, until the total amount of 5 per cent of such deposits should have been paid at the end of twenty years.

New banks organizing were required to set aside 3 per cent of their capital for the guaranty fund.

Additional assessments were provided for in case of extraordinary emergency, with a proviso that the emergency assessments should not in any calendar year exceed 2 per cent of the average daily deposits of such banks and trust companies.

If the emergency assessments should prove to be insufficient to pay off the depositors of any failed banks having valid claims against said depositors' guaranty fund, the state banking board is required to issue and deliver to each depositor having any such unpaid deposit a certificate of indebtedness for the amount of his unpaid deposit, bearing 6 per cent interest, consecutively numbered and payable in serial order.

The law provided that any bank put in liquidation by the bank commissioner should have its depositors immediately paid from the bank depositors' guaranty fund. The bank commissioner has similar powers to the Comptroller of the Currency.

The banks are forbidden to loan money in excess of 12 per cent, with a legal rate of 7 per cent.

Mr. President, I have thus outlined the principal features of the Oklahoma law, because it has been much misunderstood throughout the United States and indeed has been grossly misinterpreted by special interests, who regard the prosperity of small banks and the growth of the deposits of small banks with hostility, upon the narrow and unsound doctrine that the volume of deposits going to small banks will diminish the volume of deposits in the large banks.

In point of fact, as the deposits of the small banks grow, such banks naturally become depositors in the larger banks of the country to the extent which the convenience of commerce justifies.

For the information of the Senate and for the information of the people of the United States, I requested a statement from the state banking department of Oklahoma and submit the following letter from Hon. A. M. Young, bank commissioner, together with the inclosed condensed and comparative statements, giving the resources and condition of the state banks and of the national banks between February 14, 1908, when the Oklahoma bank-depositors' guaranty law went into effect, and June 23, 1909, with a further statement between June 23, 1909, and November 16, 1909:

STATE BANKING DEPARTMENT,
STATE OF OKLAHOMA,
Guthrie, February 2, 1910.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. OWEN: Your telegram received. I should have given this matter attention earlier, but I have been extremely busy.

I inclose condensed and comparative statements which will give you some idea as to the popularity and growth of the guaranty law in our State.

We have had three national and three state bank failures since the law went into effect. Three national banks have converted into state banks since the failure of the Columbia Bank and Trust Company and three state banks have converted into national. I have had about 25 applications for new banks since the failure of the Columbia Bank and Trust Company.

I took charge of the Columbia September 29, with deposits of $2,900,000. The doors were never closed, but individual depositors were paid as they called for their money. This large failure did not in the slightest degree interfere with other banks or the financial interests of the city or State. * * *

* * * In fact, in the first sixty days after this failure state banks gained more than 33 per cent in deposits and the national banks something like 16 per cent. I mention this, as it is entirely foreign to what usually follows a bank failure.

The First State Bank at Kiefer had on deposit with the Farmers' National Bank at Tulsa something over $20,000 at the time the latter institution failed. I took charge of this bank December 14. They had $78,000 on deposit. In eight days' time every single depositor had received their money. The Farmers' National Bank, which closed on the above date, is still closed.

The way a failed national bank is handled is very little short of barbarism.

If there is any other information desired that I can give you do not hesitate to call for it.

Assuring you of my best wishes, I am,

Very respectfully,

A. M. YOUNG, Bank Commissioner.

A. M. YOUNG, Bank Commissioner.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am informed by the bank commissioner that in his judgment the bank guaranty fund of the State of Oklahoma will not be seriously impaired when the assets of the Columbia Bank and Trust Company have been entirely liquidated; that the private depositors will lose nothing and that the State will lose nothing.

It will be observed that the state banks in Oklahoma had only $18,032,000 of individual deposits on February 29, 1908, and on November 16, 1909, had $49,775,433.41 of individual deposits, with total deposits of over $54,963,000, an increase of about 200 per cent in deposits in less than two years.

The individual deposits in the national banks February 14, 1908, were $38,298,000 and the individual deposits in national banks on June 23, 1909, were $38,111,000, showing a gain in the state-bank deposits in seventeen months of over $30,000,000 and a loss in national-bank deposits of $186,000.

Seventy-three national banks, however, during this period were converted into state banks with deposits approximating $7,300,000, so that this item must be considered in comparing the two systems.

The number of state banks has increased from 470, February 29, 1908, to 662 banks. The number of national banks has decreased from 312 to 222 banks, June 23, 1909.

In this short time the state banks from exceeding the national banks in number by about 50 per cent now exceed the national banks in number by about 300 per cent.

The increase in individual deposits in the state banks between June 23, 1909, and November 16, 1909, was $7,052,505.84, a very remarkable showing, considering that in September the serious bank failure of the Columbia Bank and Trust Company, a state bank at Oklahoma City, with deposits approximating three millions. Notwithstanding this failure, the individual deposits of the state banks increased from September 1 to November 16, 1909, $4,998,173.96.

The average reserve held by the Oklahoma state banks June 23, 1909, was 42.3 per cent—a higher reserve than that of any of the national banks of any State in the Union, except Colorado. And on November 16, 1909, the average reserve held by the Oklahoma state banks was 49.7 per cent—a reserve about as great as the average reserve of the Bank of England—and offering a favorable comparison with the Treasury of the United States, as against its outstanding liabilities.

Mr. President, the State of Oklahoma has the best banking system in the United States; it is a model for the balance of the United States. It protects the small depositor and gives him confidence, and when there is a loss due to mismanagement the loss is distributed in such a manner that it is not felt by any of the banks contributing. It is, after all, merely a mutual insurance plan.

And this is the banking system, Mr. President, which is criticised by the American Banking Association as unsound, and as a reckless banking system. It is precisely the contrary. It has promoted stability, a high reserve, and banking of the highest order.

The confidence of the people of Oklahoma in this improved banking system is shown by the deposits of the people increasing nearly 200 per cent in less than two years. The preference of the people to this banking system over the national banking system is clearly manifested by this extraordinary mark of their confidence in making their deposits. The national banks gained but a small per cent, comparatively, on an average, and the state banks gained nearly 200 per cent in this short period of time.

This development of confidence is reflected in the marvelous growth of our towns and cities in Oklahoma, which are growing as rapidly as these astonishing deposits. Let States and cities who want to learn the secret of confidence, of stability, and of rapid development come to Oklahoma and learn the lesson from her wise and virtuous laws.

Mr. President, I had the privilege of establishing the first national bank in Indian Territory, and caused the extension of the national-bank act to that Territory which afterwards became Oklahoma. My personal interests have been, and are now, almost exclusively in the national banks. The national banking system is splendidly administered; it is worthy of all honor and credit. Those banks are thoroughly deserving of the confidence of the depositors of the country, and I should like to see the national banks enjoy the full prosperity to which they are entitled. During the ten years preceding the last panic the loss to the national-bank depositors did not exceed $1 per annum out of exceeding $60,000 dollars of deposits. The abrasion of gold coin in the pockets of the people would greatly exceed this. It is a wonderful record of fidelity and of sound administration. Yet, notwithstanding this high tribute to the national banking system, we can not forget that a failure such as that of the National Bank of Commerce, of Kansas City, involving a bank whose deposits amounted to thirty-five millions, shook the confidence of the depositors contributing to this bank in twelve or fifteen States. The Walsh failure, in Chicago, served a like harmful purpose in the region of the Great Lakes.

The Morse-Heinze failures in New York shook the confidence of the depositors on the Atlantic seaboard. These failures could have been easily prevented by the guaranty fund plan. It may be true that the depositors under this system may have lost nothing through the National Bank of Commerce, nor through the Walsh failure, but they had their money tied up; they could not get their deposits when they wanted them, and the consequence is the statistical argument is not satisfying to the ordinary depositor, while it may be persuasive to the statesman who is not considering the subject from the standpoint of a depositor.

Our national-bank act should be amended, and amended immediately. It would cost the Government of the United States nothing whatever to provide this mutual insurance plan for the depositors of the national banks, and every State in the Union would immediately follow suit.

This system would give to the people of the United States freedom from financial disturbance, freedom from commercial disturbance. When the banks are disturbed every business man in the country is disturbed, for all of our business men are both borrowers and depositors.

A brilliant example of the stability obtained by the mutual insurance plan was shown in the failure of the Columbia Bank and Trust Company at Oklahoma City, a state institution, with about $3,000,000 of deposits. If this had been a national bank and these deposits had been tied up, to be ultimately paid after the bank assets were liquidated, involving from two to five years, it would have left a harvest of distrust. As it was, the depositors were promptly paid; they immediately redeposited their funds with other banks, and the state banks gained $4,998,000 of deposits from September 1 to November 16, 1909, in two months and a half, showing that the confidence of the people was not impaired by the failure of the Columbia Bank and Trust Company. The people were not hurt by it. The banks of Oklahoma City were not thrown into a panic by it; the commerce of Oklahoma City suffered no serious embarrassment and no shock; the banks did not force their clients to pay up under pressure, but the business of the community remained undisturbed, and the value of the Oklahoma bank system was triumphantly vindicated and its great worth demonstrated in a manner which should forever silence the criticism of those who prophesied evil of it, and who desire to deal fairly, frankly, and justly with this economic question.

The bank mutual insurance plan by the guaranty fund is preferable to the postal savings system, because the banks can afford to pay a higher rate of interest than the Government offers through the postal savings plan.

It avoids increasing the governmental activities or offices and leaves the people to manage their own business without increase of government expense or supervision, beyond the present supervision of the comptroller.

The postal savings bank is but another form of the guaranty of bank deposits. It is an unlimited but justifiable guaranty by the United States.

If the guaranty of bank deposits can not be established, then as an alternative I approve of the postal savings-bank system under the amendments accepted by the Senator from Montana, as set forth in the reprints of this bill, under date of February 3, 1910. This system will not take money away from the small communities to concentrate such funds in the large financial centers, but will be an important auxiliary to the state banks and to the national banks, by adding to their deposits those funds which would not be deposited at all, unless such deposits were properly guaranteed. The guaranty of the United States of these deposits will bring from hiding many millions of dollars, which will be immediately redeposited in the local banks. Under this system the unreasoning panic and want of confidence, which has heretofore caused bank depositors to withdraw currency for hoarding, will be prevented. It may not entirely prevent the occasional withdrawal for hoarding by wealthy manipulators, who occasionally lock up currency for speculative purposes in order to depress the stock market and take advantage of such depression as buyers of depressed stocks, but it will make the country outside of the influence of the rich manipulators incapable of being stampeded by the cry of panic, and will go far to give stability to our national commerce, a consummation devoutly to be wished.

The postal savings bill should add to our national banking capital several thousand millions of dollars, because every dollar of currency brought from hiding means approximately $10 of deposits and $10 of loans, the ratio of currency to deposits in the national banks of the United States being at least 10 to 1, as will appear from the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency.

If we can not have the depositors' guaranty plan, I should approve the postal savings bill as now drawn.

Mr. President, I can not acquiesce in the suggestion that the postal savings bill violates the Constitution of the United States, for the reason that I regard the postal savings system as a legitimate extension of the postal service.

The Constitution of the United States was established by the people of the United States, and was ratified by the people of the various States acting through their constituted authority, and was drawn, as its preamble declares:

> In order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and so forth.

And the idea of promoting the general welfare runs like a golden thread throughout the entire Constitution, giving life and vitality to clauses which require interpretation in the light of this national purpose.

While I do not believe that section 8, Article I, which provides for the laying and collecting of taxes, could be construed to apply to any and all objects beyond this obvious and manifest purpose of the raising of taxes, I do believe that the Constitution of the United States, authorizing the establishment of the postal system, providing for the establishment of post-offices and post-roads, is not extended unduly when it embraces the postal savings system. In its primary establishment it was necessarily crude, but by the common consent of all of the people of the United States it has been gradually extended without protest, without conflict, without challenge on the part of anyone that it was a violation of the Constitution of the United States as it has been expanded.

For example, in the matter of issuing money orders, a citizen goes to a post-office, deposits his money in the post-office, receives a postal money order payable either to himself or to his order. It becomes, in effect, a bill of exchange, to be cashed by the post-office in any part of the United States. It is, in fact, a banking transaction. It is making the post-office a place of deposit. It is making the post-office a place where deposits are paid, and the extension of the postal savings system, in the manner proposed in this bill, is only an enlargement providing that these transactions shall be limited to a fixed amount and shall bear interest. Mr. President, since the consent of the governed is the best evidence of the justification of government and since the Republican party, through its national platform, has declared in favor of the postal savings-bank system, and since the Democratic party has made the same declaration through its platform, and since the people of the United States, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, have voted for candidates upon those two platforms, I take it there never was a proposition brought before the Congress that had a more universal acquiescence of the people in its constitutionality. I therefore take it that it is not outside of the grant of constitutional power to extend the postal system so as to include the postal savings plan, because it is a reasonable expansion of the conveniences of the post-offices established under the Constitution and because such expansion is universally approved by the people of the United States.

More than that, Mr. President, since the postal savings plan is of the greatest importance in preventing panics in this country, by providing a safe place of deposit, by taking care of those depositors who are the most timid of any, and who always constitute a menace to the banks of the country by precipitating runs on the banks because of their fears, and since this system will be an important factor in preventing financial panic, the postal savings system will be an agency of the United States in regulating commerce between the States and preventing its paralysis by panic.

By preventing panic it will serve also as an agency of government in regulating the value of money or its purchasing power. I have heretofore shown that money in times of panic has twice the purchasing power which it has in times of financial prosperity.

I take it that both parties in the United States, through their representatives in national convention believed the postal savings system to be constitutional, otherwise both parties in the United States would not have committed themselves to the postal savings system, and therefore it is in order to justify this legislation, outside of constitutional considerations, by saying that it would promote the providence of the people, their economy, their thrift. Outside of the constitutional argument, this legislation is justified because it will bring from hiding immense hoards of banking capital and will add greatly to our financial strength and to our commercial power as a nation.

Every other civilized nation in the world has adopted it. Gladstone declared that it was the most important act of his long life to have promoted this system in the British Empire.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I should give my adherence to this bill in the event that the Senate does not accede to the plan proposed for the strengthening of the national banks, which I should like to see done in any contingency, and I shall at the proper moment offer such an amendment to the consideration and vote of the Senate, after it shall have been disposed of by the vote of the Senate, as a proposed substitute.

And whenever it shall appear from the preceding-year reports made by such banking corporation that the total deposits are more than ten times the amount of its paid-up capital and surplus, deposits of other banks not included, the bank commissioner shall have power and it shall be his duty to require such bank within thirty days to increase its capital or surplus to conform to the provisions of this act or cease to receive deposits.

SEC. 281. Amount of capital—Grades: That hereafter the capital stock, which shall be fully paid up, shall not be less than $10,000 in towns having 500 inhabitants or less; the capital stock, which shall be fully paid up, shall not be less than $15,000 in towns having more than 500 inhabitants and not more than 1,500 inhabitants; the capital stock, which shall be fully paid up, shall not be less than $25,000 in cities and towns having more than 1,500 inhabitants and less than 6,000 inhabitants; the capital stock, which shall be fully paid up, shall not be less than $50,000 in cities having more than 6,000 inhabitants and less than 20,000 inhabitants; the capital stock, which shall be fully paid up, shall not be less than $100,000 in cities having more than 20,000 inhabitants.

A certificate must be filed with the bank commissioner by the chairman and secretary of the meeting, and by a majority of all the directors, showing the compliance of the provisions of this section, the amount to which the capital stock has been increased or decreased, the amount of stock represented at the meeting, and the vote upon the question to increase or decrease the capital stock. No such changes in the capital stock of any such association shall be valid or binding until the same shall have been approved by the bank commissioner. Penalty for false swearing: Every officer or employee of a bank required by this act to take an oath or affirmation who shall willfully swear or affirm falsely shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished as provided by the laws of this State in case of perjury.

ARTICLE II.

BANKING BOARD—GUARANTY FUND.

SEC. 319. State banking board, who compose: The state banking board shall be composed of the governor, lieutenant-governor, the president of the board of agriculture, state treasurer, and state auditor. Said board shall have the supervision and management of the depositors' guaranty fund, hereinafter provided for, and shall have power to adopt all suitable rules and regulations not inconsistent with law for the management and administration of the same.

SEC. 320. Assessment for guaranty fund: There is hereby levied an assessment against the capital stock of each and every bank and trust company organized or existing under the laws of this State for the purpose of creating a depositors' guaranty fund equal to 5 per cent of its average daily deposits during its continuance in business as a banking corporation. Said assessments shall be payable one-fifth during the first year and one-twentieth during each year thereafter until the total amount of said 5 per cent assessment shall have been fully paid: Provided, however, That the assessments heretofore levied and paid by banking corporations or trust companies now existing shall be deducted from and credited as a payment on said 5 per cent assessment hereby levied. The average daily deposits of each bank during the preceding year prior to the passage and approval of this act shall be taken as the basis for computing the amount of the first payment on the levy hereby made. One year after the passage and approval of this act, and annually thereafter, each bank and trust company doing business under the laws of this State shall report to the bank commissioner the amount of its average daily deposits for the preceding year, and if such deposits are in excess of the amount upon which the first or subsequent payment of the levy hereby made is computed, each bank or trust company having such increased deposits shall immediately pay in the depositors' guaranty fund a sum sufficient to pay any deficiency on said first or subsequent payment, as shown by such increased deposits. After the 5 per cent assessment hereby levied shall have been fully paid up no additional assessments shall be levied or collected against the capital stock of any such bank or trust company, except emergency assessments hereinafter provided, to pay the depositors of failed banks, and except assessments as may be necessary by reason of increased deposits to maintain such funds at 5 per cent of the aggregate of all deposits in such banks and trust companies doing business under the laws of this State. Whenever the depositors' guaranty fund shall become impaired or be reduced below said 5 per cent by reason of payments to depositors of failed banks the state banking board shall have the power, and it shall be their duty, to levy emergency assessments against the capital stock of each bank and trust company doing business in this State sufficient to restore said impairment or reduction below 5 per cent; but the aggregate of such emergency assessments shall not in any one calendar year exceed 2 per cent of the average daily deposits of all such banks and trust companies. If the amount realized from such emergency assessments shall be insufficient to pay off the depositors of all failed banks having valid claims against said depositors' guaranty fund, the state banking board shall issue and deliver to each depositor having any such unpaid deposit a certificate of indebtedness for the amount of the unpaid deposit bearing 6 per cent interest. Such certificates shall be consecutively numbered and shall be payable upon the call of the state banking board in like manner as state warrants are paid by the state treasurer in the order of their issue out of the emergency levy thereafter made; and the state banking board shall from year to year levy emergency assessments as hereinbefore provided against the capital stock of all banking corporations and trust companies doing business in this State until all such certificates of indebtedness, with the accrued interest thereon, shall have been fully paid. As rapidly as the assets of failed banks are liquidated and realized upon by the bank commissioner the same shall be applied first after the payment of the expense of liquidation to the repayment to the depositors' guaranty fund of all money paid out of said fund to the depositors of such failed bank, and shall be applied by the state banking board toward refunding any emergency assessment levied by reason of the failure of such liquidated bank: Provided, further, That 75 per cent of the depositors' guaranty fund shall be invested for the benefit of said fund in state warrants or such other securities as state funds are now required to be invested.

SEC. 320. Assessment for guaranty fund: There is hereby levied an assessment of 1 per cent of the bank's daily average deposits, less the deposits of the United States, and state funds, if otherwise secured, for the preceding year, upon each and every bank and trust company organized or existing under the laws of this State, for the purpose of creating a depositors' guaranty fund. Said assessment shall be collected upon call of the state banking board. In one year from the time the first assessment is levied, and annually thereafter, each bank and trust company subject to the provisions of this act shall report to the bank commissioner the amount of its average daily deposits for the preceding year; and if such deposits are in excess of the amount upon which 1 per cent was previously paid, said report shall be accompanied by additional funds to equal 1 per cent of the daily average excess of deposits, less the deposits of the United States Government for the year over the preceding year, and each amount shall be added to the depositors' guaranty fund. If the depositors' guaranty fund is depleted from any cause it shall be the duty of the state banking board, in order to keep said fund up to 1 per cent of the total deposits in all of the said banks and trust companies subject to the provisions of this act, to levy a special assessment to cover such deficiency, which special assessment shall be levied upon the capital stock of the banks and trust companies subject to this act, according to the amount of their deposits as reported in the office of the bank commissioner. And such special assessment shall become immediately due and payable.

SEC. 321. New banks to pay 3 per cent on capital stock: Bank and trust companies organized subsequent to the enactment of this act shall pay into the depositors' guaranty fund 3 per cent of the amount of their capital stock when they open for business, which amount shall constitute a credit fund, subject to adjustment on the basis of its deposits, as provided for other banks and trust companies now existing at the end of one year: Provided, however, That said 3 per cent payment shall not be required of new banks and trust companies formed by the reorganization or consolidation of banks and trust companies that have previously complied with the terms of this act.

SEC. 322. Commissioner to close up business of insolvent banks: Whenever any bank or trust company organized or existing under the laws of this State shall voluntarily place itself in the hands of the bank commissioner, or whenever any judgment shall be rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, adjudging and decreeing that such bank or trust company is insolvent, or whenever its rights or franchises to conduct a banking business under the laws of this State shall have been adjudged to be forfeited, or whenever the bank commissioner shall become satisfied of the insolvency of any such bank or trust company, he may, after due examination of its affairs, take possession of said bank or trust company and its assets and proceed to wind up its affairs and enforce the personal liability of the stockholders, officers, and directors.

SEC. 323. Depositors to be paid in full from guaranty fund—Lien on assets: In the event that the bank commissioner shall take possession of any bank or trust company which is subject to the provisions of this act, the depositors of said bank or trust company shall be paid in full; and when the cash available, or that can be made immediately available, of said bank or trust company is insufficient to discharge its obligations to depositors, the banking board shall draw from the depositors' guaranty fund and from additional assessments, if required, as provided in section 2, the amount necessary to make up the deficiency, and the State shall have for the benefit of the depositors' guaranty fund a first lien upon the assets of said bank or trust company and all liabilities against the stockholders, officers, and directors of said bank or trust company against all other persons, corporations, or firms. Such liabilities may be enforced by the State for the benefit of the depositors' guaranty fund.

SEC. 324. Commissioner to take charge: The bank commission shall take possession of the books, records, and assets of every description of such bank or trust company, collect debts, dues, and claims belonging to it, and upon order of the district court or judge thereof may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on like order may sell all the real or personal property of such bank or trust company upon such terms as the court or judge thereof may direct, and may, if necessary, pay the debts of such bank or trust company and enforce the liabilities of the stockholders, officers, and directors: Provided, however, That bad or doubtful debts as used in this section shall not include the liability of stockholders, officers, and directors.

SEC. 325. Certificate of compliance: The bank commissioner shall deliver to each bank or trust company that has complied with the provisions of this act a certificate stating that said bank or trust company had complied with the laws of this State for the protection of bank depositors, and that safety to its depositors is guaranteed by the depositors' guaranty fund of the State of Oklahoma. Such certificate shall be conspicuously displayed in its place of business, and said bank or trust company may print or engrave upon its stationery and advertising matter words to the effect that its depositors are protected by the depositors' guaranty fund of the State of Oklahoma: Provided, however, That hereafter all banks operating under the guaranty law of the State of Oklahoma shall be permitted to advertise that their deposits are guaranteed by the depositors' guaranty fund, but that no bank shall be permitted to advertise its deposits as guaranteed by the State of Oklahoma, and any bank or bank officer or employee who shall advertise their deposits as guaranteed by the State of Oklahoma shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment in the county jail for thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the trial court.

SEC. 326. Stockholders may repair loss: After the bank commissioner shall have taken possession of any bank or trust company which is subject to the provisions of this act, the stockholders thereof may repair its credit, restore or substitute its reserves, and otherwise place it in condition so that it is qualified to do a general banking business as before it was taken possession of by the bank commissioners; but such bank shall not be permitted to reopen its business until the bank commissioner, after a careful investigation of its affairs, is of the opinion that its stockholders have complied with the laws, that the bank's credit and funds are in all respects repaired, and all advances, if any, made from the depositors' guaranty fund fully repaid, its reserve restored or sufficiently substituted, and that it should be permitted again to reopen for business, whereupon said bank commissioner is authorized to issue written permission for reopening of said bank in the same manner as permission to do business is granted after the incorporation thereof, and thereupon said bank may be reopened to do a general banking business.

SEC. 327. Guaranteed banks may become state depositories: Any bank or trust company which has complied with the provisions of this act shall be eligible to act as a depository of state funds, of any fund under the control of the State or any officer thereof, upon compliance with the laws of this State relating to the deposits of public funds.

SEC. 328. State and county depositories: Any bank duly organized under and in compliance with the laws of this State relating to banks and banking corporations and doing business in the State of Oklahoma, or any national bank organized under the laws of the United States and doing business in the State of Oklahoma, shall be qualified to become state and county depositories, when so designated according to law, by giving securities by the depositing with the proper state or county officers United States bonds or state bonds or general-fund state warrants or state special-fund warrants, or approved county or municipal bonds in the State, or approved county or school district warrants in the State, and the proper officers are hereby authorized and empowered to contract accordingly.

ARTICLE III.

BANK COMMISSIONER.

SEC. 329. Commissioner to be appointed by governor: The governor shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, a bank commissioner, who shall hold office for the term of four years and until his successor is appointed and qualified. No officer or employee of any bank or any person interested as owner or stockholder of any bank shall be eligible to the office of bank commissioner: Provided, That no person shall be appointed as bank commissioner who shall not have had, prior to such appointment, at least three years' practical experience as a banker.

SEC. 330. Commissioner to give bond: The bank commissioner shall, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, take and subscribe the usual oath of office and execute to the State of Oklahoma a bond in the sum of $25,000, with sufficient surety, for the faithful performance of his duty, to be approved and filed as provided by law.

SEC. 331. Banks must be examined twice each year: It shall be the duty of the bank commissioner, or one of his assistants, to visit each and every bank or trust company subject to the provisions of this act at least twice each year, and oftener if he deems it advisable, for the purpose of making a full and careful examination and inquiry into the condition of the affairs of such bank, and for that purpose the bank commissioner and his assistant are hereby authorized and empowered to administer oaths, and to examine under oath the stockholders and directors and all officers and employees and agents of such banks, or other persons. The commissioner shall reduce the result thereof to writing, which shall contain a full, true, and careful statement of the condition of such bank or trust company, and file and retain the same in his office.

SEC. 332. Salary—Positions created: The bank commissioner's salary shall be $2,500 per annum and traveling expenses. There is hereby created and established eight positions, each position to be known as an assistant to the bank commissioner, and to be filled by appointment by the bank commissioner, subject to the approval of the governor, and the salary of each said assistant to the bank commissioner shall be $1,800 per annum and traveling expenses.

SEC. 333. Fee for examination: Each and every bank so examined having not more than $15,000 capital stock paid in shall pay a fee of $15 for each and every examination; and each and every bank having more than $15,000 capital stock paid in and not more than $25,000 paid in shall pay a fee of $20; and each and every bank having more than $25,000 capital stock paid in and not more than $40,000 capital stock paid in shall pay a fee of $25; and each and every bank having more than $40,000 capital stock paid in and not more than $50,000 capital stock paid in, shall pay a fee of $30; and each and every bank having more than $50,000 capital stock paid in shall pay a fee of $35 to the commissioner.

SEC. 334. SEC. 335. Special reports may be required: The bank commissioner shall have power at any time when he deems it necessary to call upon any bank or trust company organized under the laws of this State, and upon any national bank whose depositors are protected by the depositors' guaranty fund, for a report of its condition upon any given day which is passed, or as often as the bank commissioner may deem it necessary: Provided, That he shall require at least four such reports during each and every calendar year. A copy of each call made by the bank commissioner shall be mailed to each such bank.

SEC. 336. Mr. WARREN. The bill will go over, as the Senator who reported it is not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 6058) amending section 2 of an act entitled "An act to increase the pension of widows, minor children, etc., of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, etc., and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war," approved April 19, 1908, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WARREN. I think the bill should be passed over until the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

OVERTIME CLAIMS OF LETTER CARRIERS.

The bill (S. 3638) to provide for the payment of overtime claims of letter carriers excluded from judgment as barred by limitation, was announced as next in order, and the Secretary read the bill.

Mr. CLAY. From what committee does the bill come?

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SMOOT. A similar bill has passed the Senate two or three times.

Mr. CLAY. I think it carries $287,000.

Mr. SMOOT. It carries $282,943.88.

Mr. CLAY. Was it unanimously reported by the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. It was unanimously reported by the committee. It is simply to pay claims that were barred by the statute of limitation. All other letter carriers in the country were paid, and virtually these did not make their claim in time for the reason that the Post-Office Department gave them to understand that the claims would be taken care of in the course of time. There is a full and complete report.

Mr. CLAY. A similar bill passed the Senate in the last Congress?

Mr. SMOOT. In the last Congress, and I think twice before.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator if there is not a report in the shape of a letter from the then Postmaster-General Bissell recommending that these claims be paid?

Mr. SMOOT. It is recommended by the department, not only by one Postmaster-General, but by two.

Mr. CLAY. I will withdraw my objection, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES J. SMITH.

The bill (S. 5752) to correct the military record of Charles J. Smith, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that Charles J. Smith shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged as a private in Company F, Third Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Cavalry, as of date August 1, 1865, and directs the Secretary of War to issue to him an honorable discharge as of that date. But no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue or become payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, with the condition of the business of the Senate and the numerous committees that are to meet to-morrow, I think the business would be best subserved if we should adjourn over. I therefore move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it shall be until Monday.

Mr. HEYBURN. Has the Senator taken into consideration the fact that we have fixed a limitation upon the consideration of some very important measures, notably the Hawaiian bill and the postal savings-bank bill? It was stated yesterday, whether formally or informally I do not remember, that certain Senators expected to speak to-morrow. There is a very thin attendance here.

Mr. WARREN. If there is any objection——

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no objection; I only made the suggestion.

Mr. WARREN. I investigated as far as I could, and I found that no one was ready; but if the Senator has in mind any Senator who wishes to address the Senate to-morow, I shall withdraw the motion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I made the suggestion merely because there are very few present, and because of the fact that yesterday, in fixing the time to conclude the consideration of the postal savings-bank bill, it was suggested that Senators might take advantage of to-morrow. I have personally no objection whatever; in fact, I would rather welcome an adjournment of that kind.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Chair if the clerks at the desk have notice of any remarks to be delivered to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have none. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the calendar will be stated.

SERVICE OF GRAND JURIES.

The bill (H. R. 16037) to amend section 810 of the Revised Statutes was announced as next in order.

Mr. BACON. I will inquire whether that bill comes from the Judiciary Committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It comes from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask attention to the bill. It is a bill, as I remember it, of general application all over the United States.

Mr. KEAN. I presume it is to apply to the southern district of New York.

Mr. HEYBURN. The next bill on the calendar, the bill (H. R. 16364) to amend in part section 658 of the Revised Statutes, applies to New York. There are two bills here, and I think there might be some confusion in the mind of the Senate. One bill is local to New York. That I should not undertake to consider or discuss.

RECLAMATION FUND.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5705) to authorize the issue and sale of certificates of indebtedness against the reclamation fund.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be temporarily laid aside.

SERVICE OF GRAND JURIES.

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill (H. R. 16037) to amend section 810 of the Revised Statutes proposes to establish a uniform system in regard to the calling of grand juries that shall apply in each of the States. We have varying rules now. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws has had this matter under consideration off and on for a month and has been dealing with the subject. It is not one, as we know from experience in that committee, that can be taken up and disposed of under Rule VIII, unless we are ready to stop and consider it at this time.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. In view of the absence of the Senator having the bill in charge, I think it had best be passed over.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am perfectly willing either to have the bill passed over or to consider it.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator in charge not being here, I think it should be passed over.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely make this statement now in order that it may rest in the minds of Senators that this is not a measure which should be hastily considered, because you will find that it changes the existing law in some of your States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the request of the Senator from Minnesota, the bill will be passed over.

COURT TERMS IN NEW YORK.

The bill (H. R. 16364) to amend, in part, section 658 of the Revised Statutes was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over, on the request of the Senator from Idaho.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN HAWAII.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 80) providing for a special election in the Territory of Hawaii was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. The chairman of the committee, from which the joint resolution was reported, is not present. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution goes over, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

It provides that any person who, prior to the passage of this act, has made entry under the homestead laws, but from any cause has lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same, shall be entitled to the benefits of the homestead law as though such former entry had not been made, and any person applying for a second homestead under this act shall furnish the description and date of his former entry. But the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person whose former entry was canceled for fraud, or who relinquished the former entry for a valuable consideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to amend the bill by striking out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10, on page 30, for the reason that the beneficiary thereunder has died since the bill was reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, strike out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10, in the following words:

Johnson* in the waters of East River, harbor of New York, on December 23, 1907, may be sued for by the owners of lighter No. 128 in the United States district court for the southern district of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOMESTEAD PATENTS WITHIN RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The bill (S. 5048) providing that entrymen for homesteads within reclamation projects shall receive patent upon satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation for five years, the same as though said entry had been made under the original homestead act, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that is a very important bill, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] who reported it is out of the Chamber for the time being. I think he is probably engaged on a committee. I therefore suggest that the bill go over without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I want to suggest that the bill might be taken up even in the absence of the Senator from Montana who reported it. I do not think there is any objection to it from that source, but I am anxious to have the bill amended. The bill, as I originally introduced it, is reported here with amendments. I will say to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] that this is such an important matter that, if it were not for the fact that I wish to have some of the amendments disagreed to, I should want to take it up even by a vote; but since the Senator from Montana is absent, I think it is not proper, in his absence, that I should undertake to have any amendments made to the bill or to have any amendments disagreed to which have been reported by the committee. Therefore I am not going to object to the bill going over in accordance with the request of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. KEAN. Then, do I understand the Senator from Nebraska to object to the report of the committee on this bill?

Mr. BURKETT. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska is not entirely satisfied with the report which the committee has made on the bill.

Mr. KEAN. Would the Senator like to have the bill recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. BURKETT. I think that we can perhaps make suitable amendments to the bill here on the floor, as is the general custom, without having the bill go back to the committee. I want it to stay on the calendar where it is at present.

Mr. KEAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I see the bill was reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands. That committee seems to have reported a good many bills and to be quite active.

COURT TERMS IN NEW YORK.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber attending to important matters when Order of Business No. 265 came up and was passed over. I ask unanimous consent that it may be now considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him, which the Secretary will state by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 16364) to amend in part section 658 of the Revised Statutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

Mr. KEAN. I do not object to going back to the bill, but I should like to have an explanation of it from the Senator from New York.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, this is a bill that applies entirely to the southern district of New York. Its only object is to facilitate and expedite criminal trials there.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill has not yet been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 658 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as provides for the holding of circuit courts in the southern district of New York "exclusively for the trial and disposal of criminal cases, and matters arising and pending in said court, on the second Wednesday in January, March, and May, on the third Wednesday in June, and on the second Wednesday in October and December," be amended so as to read "exclusively for the trial and disposal of criminal cases, and matters arising and pending in said court, on the first Mondays in January, March, May, July, September, and November."

Mr. KEAN. Will not the Senator from New York kindly explain what the proposed change is?

Mr. DEPEW. The sessions of the court for the purpose of transacting criminal business are irregular. Some are long, others are too short, and this bill has been recommended by the bar practicing in that court and by the judges for the purpose of equalizing the terms. They say that it will not only facilitate and expedite business, but will make it more convenient for the court and also for the bar.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SERVICE OF GRAND JURIES.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, for the same reason which I have suggested in regard to the bill just passed, I ask that House bill 16037 be now taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him, which the Secretary will state by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 16037) to amend section 810 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. What is the question before the Senate, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is whether the bill shall be considered.

Mr. KEAN. Let it be read, and let us have an explanation of the bill, subject to objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not rise to object, but I rose to make some remarks when the bill is before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN. I should like, first, to have an explanation of the bill. The Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] has a report which, I believe, he would like to present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reserving the right to object, the Senator from New Jersey requests an explanation of the bill.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, there is a report of the House committee, which is very clear. The bill was unanimously reported by the House Committee on the Judiciary and passed unanimously by the House. It was also unanimously reported by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. The enormous burden put upon the courts in New York on account of the sugar cases renders it necessary to have more grand juries than are now called for. The object of the bill is to enable the district attorney to petition the court to secure an extra grand jury, or to have two or three grand juries, as the case may be, sitting at the same time, in order that criminal business may be fairly and properly transacted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 810 of the Revised Statutes so as to read:

SEC. 810. No grand jury shall be summoned to attend any circuit or district court unless one of the judges of such circuit court, or the judge of such district, in his own discretion, or upon a notification by the district attorney that such jury will be needed, orders a venire issue therefor. If the United States attorney for the district shall certify in writing to the district judge, or the senior district judge of the district, or one of the judges of said circuit court, that the exigencies of the public service require it, the judge may in his discretion also order a venire to issue for a second grand jury. Either of said courts may in term order a grand jury to be summoned at such time, and to serve such time as it may direct, whenever in its judgment it may be proper to do so. But nothing herein shall operate to extend beyond the time permitted by law the imprisonment before indictment found of a person accused of a crime or offense, or the time during which a person so accused may be held under recognizance before indictment found.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that this is limited to two grand juries. The language is explicit.

Mr. DEPEW. To two grand juries.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. And it is general. It is a pretty serious question outside of New York City. In New York City it would seem that the conditions are unusual. The pressure of business there might require, if we can have two grand juries in session at the same time, that we should allow them to have them in New York; but this is of general application. Ordinarily there is very serious objection to impaneling two grand juries at the same term of court to sit at the same time, because every man who is indicted will say that, had his case been submitted to the other grand jury, they would not have indicted him; and the venire from which the second grand jury is drawn will be impoverished to the extent of the first grand jury drawn.

This matter has been under serious consideration in a committee of this body, and whether or not this should be made of general application throughout the United States is a question that the lawyers especially of this body ought to give consideration to. If the business pressure is so great in the courts in New York that the long-established rule in every civilized country shall be deviated from, let us do it with our eyes open; but whether or not this should be confined to New York is a question that should receive consideration now.

In other parts of the country where there is no such pressure under the provisions of this bill some one exercising bad judgment, or not having judgment in the matter, might have two grand juries impaneled for the very purpose of getting rid of 16 men by drawing them on the first panel of the grand jury. Lawyers will readily understand how that might be done; and that which might be done is deemed by the law in legislating to be done, because we are here for the purpose of preventing those things.

I think that the Senator from New York, having this bill in charge, probably had better confine it to the districts where its application is urgent and free from at least some of the objections I have suggested.

I have grave doubt of the right of a court to split itself. The grand jury is a part of the court; and I have grave doubt as to whether or not the court can sit at two places at the same time, and whether or not two grand juries can be impaneled. Of course it has not received any interpretation, because it has not been possible heretofore for the question to be raised; but I think it would be a little safer to confine the application of the bill to those districts in New York.

Mr. DEPEW. Would the Senator suggest an amendment, then?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I suggest that the provisions of the bill be confined to any particular district in New York.

Mr. KEAN. The southern and eastern districts.

Mr. DEPEW. Yes; to the southern and eastern districts of New York.

Mr. HEYBURN. To the southern and eastern districts of New York. There is not full enough attendance here, especially of lawyers, to make a law of this kind, applicable all over the United States, with the meager consideration that it is receiving. I move that amendment.

Mr. DEPEW. The amendment should be inserted in line 6, should it not?

Mr. HEYBURN. In the sixth line. Instead of the words "any circuit or district court," define it and limit it to the southern and eastern districts of New York.

Mr. DEPEW. Let it read "summoned to attend the circuit and district courts for the southern and eastern districts of New York."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho, if he thinks any difficulty would arise from the fact that there would not be uniformity of practice in the United States courts in this particular? I myself think there would not; but I make the suggestion to the Senator. I am not entirely in harmony with his views as to the matter, because I think all legislation of this sort, so far as it can be, should be uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and we are endeavoring to make it so.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And I see no reason why, if this matter is left to the sound discretion of the court, as it is in this bill, as I remember, any harm or difficulty would arise from making it uniform, as the bill provides. Of course I think that no district in the United States requires two grand juries, perhaps, except the districts in New York to which the Senator has had his attention directed; but personally I would much prefer the bill to carry a uniform system of grand juries than to run the risk, perhaps, of having a diversified classification.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have no doubt at all that in the very near future we will determine here the question as to whether or not this very measure shall be made applicable throughout the United States, because it is entirely proper that I should say that the matter is already agreed upon in the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and the report of that committee will doubtless be before this body in a few days. It contains a provision including this.

This is like some other matters that are pending. Simply in order to get an expression of the sentiment of either House of Congress, we have sent ahead several measures dissociated from the general report, so as to get an expression of opinion beforehand.

My object in proposing the segregation of this was that the legality of it might be tested in New York between now and some very near time in the future without making it applicable to the whole country. A dozen cases might arise throughout the country, because this does open the way to unscrupulous men to fix the proceedings in the court, for a United States attorney could select the men that he would send before a certain grand jury. He might say "I am going to send those men before grand jury No. 1," having in mind, so far as his judgment would enable him to determine, the peculiar results that might come from that grand jury as distinguished from the other. That is a very dangerous power to place in the hands of any man; and the way this bill is drawn, of course, it would be entirely within the province of a district attorney to say before which grand jury he would send particular men. That is more serious than it might seem at the first suggestion.

Mr. BURKETT and Mr. DEPEW addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT], as I think he rose first.

Mr. BURKETT. I merely want to ask a question. If this bill is amended in the way the Senator suggests, what would become of the general law for the other districts in the United States?

Mr. HEYBURN. We have an existing law now. That would leave existing law stand just as it is.

Mr. BURKETT. Then this does not change the provision of the general law, with reference to the other districts?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; it does not change it; and the suggestion that I have made is so serious that in the consideration of it elsewhere we have had grave doubts. I do not think there is a member of the committee who has not grave doubts as to whether it is safe to place in the hands of any man an engine with the possibility of wrong and harm. I think the suggestion will appeal to the Senator from New York.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, if I understood correctly the Senator from Idaho, he intimated that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws have already agreed upon a provision in the Revised Statutes which is substantially the same as this bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I may say that we have tentatively agreed. There are a few sections that are still open for further consideration. I am not sure, when that committee's report comes in here, that I shall support a provision for two grand juries sitting at the same time in the same court, giving the district attorney the power to select which one of them he will send accused parties before.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, the law as it stands to-day provides:

SEC. 810. No grand jury shall be summoned to attend any circuit or district court unless one of the judges of such circuit court or the judge of such district, in his own discretion or upon a notification by the district attorney that such jury will be needed, orders a venire issue therefor.

That relates to the usual and ordinary grand jury. It is proposed to add to that this provision:

If the United States attorney for the district shall certify in writing to the district judge or the senior district judge of the district, or one of the judges of said circuit court, that the exigencies of the public service require it, the judge may, in his discretion, also order a venire to issue for a second grand jury.

In other words, the provision added by the amendment is precisely the same as the law is now, except that it provides for another grand jury.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the whole proposition, and it was to that condition that I directed my remarks, Mr. President. It is not the manner of securing the second jury that I deem either insufficient or objectionable in any way; but it is as to the propriety of creating two tribunals and leaving the power of selection with the United States attorney as to which of those two tribunals, each having the same jurisdiction, he will send certain people before. I think that question will appeal to lawyers here.

I do not know at this time whether or not there is a substantial constitutional objection to the bill. The grand jury is a unit; the grand jury is a part of the jurisprudence of a given jurisdiction.

Mr. KEAN. The bill is still subject to objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know it is; but I think there is profit sometimes, even at this stage of the consideration of a bill, in giving out such suggestions as may cause those who must act upon it to give it their fullest attention. I do not believe that this measure to-day should be disposed of, because it involves these questions. I would have been content with a simple objection, except that I know that at first glance all of the difficulties that may arise very often do not present themselves. I think the bill had better go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is under consideration by unanimous consent.

Mr. KEAN. But subject to objection. I withheld my objection to it, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair stated that the Senator from New Jersey withheld an objection to unanimous consent subject to an explanation of the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEAN. Subject to an explanation of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. After the Senator from New York had made the explanation, the Chair then asked if there was objection to the consideration of the bill. The Chair then said that the bill was before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair thinks the Senator from New York will be only too glad to let the bill go over if the Senator from Idaho or the Senator from New Jersey desire, but the Senator wanted to know what the parliamentary situation was, and the Chair has given it to him.

Mr. DEPEW. I would suggest to the Senator that in line 10 there should be added after the words "United States attorney" the words "for the southern or eastern district of New York."

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall not object to the bill passing with limited application. Then, perhaps, between now and some time in the near future we shall have a decision upon the question and practically test it, although it is quite dangerous even to allow it.

Mr. DEPEW. It is a matter of vital importance, in view of the immense amount of criminal business which is thrown upon the district attorney and upon the court there, that they should have two grand juries. In the state courts it is the commonest thing with us to have two grand juries. I think last year there were two grand juries running all the while. So I move to amend line 10 by inserting, after the words "United States attorney," the words "for the southern or eastern district of New York."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10, before the word "shall," strike out the word "district" and insert the words "southern or eastern district of New York."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT BUILDING LINES AND RESTRICTIONS.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I inquire what became of the bill (S. 5715) providing for the establishment of building lines and special building restrictions in the District of Columbia? I presume it came up when I was unavoidably out of the Senate. I should like to have that bill passed. It is recommended by the commissioners and unanimously reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate. Certainly there can be no objection to it.

Mr. WARREN. It went over without prejudice in the absence of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill be read first.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. KEAN. I do not object to the bill, because I have not read it; but it ought to be read, subject to objection.

Mr. SCOTT. It is a short bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill, subject to objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, we are consuming a lot of time in reading a bill that can not possibly be considered during the remaining hours of this day. There is an attempt here to carry out the Haussmann plan of Paris or some such plan. We can not do this under the law. You can not, because 90 per cent of the men choose to give their property away, compel the other 10 per cent to do it. You can not enforce it at all. It is a pretty large proposition. The bill provides that they shall control the style of architecture that shall be applied.

Mr. CULLOM. Object.

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill has been taken up.

Mr. KEAN. No; it has not. It is being read, subject to objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. I object to the bill's being taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, a number of Senators know more about these bills than Senators who are on the committee and who for weeks have gone into the details of the bills very thoroughly and have got a unanimous report from the committee. Yet Senators in five minutes know more about the bills than those of us who have devoted weeks to them.

Mr. HEYBURN. A man does not have to give one minute's consideration to the provisions of this bill to observe that it undertakes to allow 90 per cent of the people to compel the other 10 per cent to give away their property.

Mr. SCOTT. I hope the Senator will read the bill. He will then change his opinion on finding that he is mistaken. I am sure he has not read the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have read the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. No; you have not read it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has gone over.

TIMBER-CULTURE LAWS.

The bill (S. 9) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, was announced as the next business in order on the calendar, and was read.

Mr. SCOTT. Let the bill go over. I have not had time to consider it. I ask that it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

The bill (S. 5835) for the settlement of conflicting claims of the State of Wisconsin and its grantees, and the La Pointe and Lac du Flambeau bands of Chippewa Indians, to certain school and swamp lands in the reservations of said Indians in Wisconsin, was announced as the next bill in order on the calendar, and was read.

Mr. SCOTT. Before objecting to the bill—and I do not know that I shall—I should like to hear from the Senator from Wisconsin and have him explain the bill. It is a very long and complicated measure, and I think we should know more about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reserving the right to object.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In order to make the bill conform to the report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, I wish to offer an amendment, on page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized," to insert "subject to the approval of Congress." By an error the bill was not reported with that amendment, which was adopted by the committee. It should have been so reported, and I should like to make that correction in it now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is not now before the Senate. The Senator from West Virginia has reserved the right to object until an explanation, satisfactory to him, of the bill is given. The Chair was waiting for the explanation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not understand the statement of the Senator from West Virginia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia reserved the right to object until a statement explaining the terms of the bill was made.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, a controversy has arisen between the Federal Government and the State of Wisconsin with respect to certain lands in Wisconsin—some of the school sections and swamp lands granted to the State at the time the State was admitted. Subsequently, the Federal Government made treaties with the Indians and located them upon lands in Wisconsin, including within those reservations certain school sections and certain sections designated as swamp lands which had theretofore been granted to the State.

Now, all this bill proposes to do is to have a preliminary investigation by the Secretary of the Interior, have the lands appraised, and because a part of the lands are timber lands to ascertain the value of the timber and the value of the land. When the authorities of the State of Wisconsin and the Secretary of the Interior agree upon a basis of settlement, this bill provides that a report of the result shall be made to Congress and a plan be submitted to Congress for the settlement of the differences arising between the Federal Government and the State of Wisconsin out of this conveyance of land to both parties—that is, to the State and to the Indians.

In a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Secretary of the Interior states clearly the purposes of this bill and lays stress upon the fact that under its terms no final action can be taken until the action agreed upon shall be approved by Congress.

The letter of the Secretary of the Interior is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 21, 1910.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by your reference of January 29, for consideration and report by this department, of S. 5835, a bill for the settlement of conflicting claims of the State of Wisconsin and its grantees, and the La Pointe and Lac du Flambeau bands of Chippewa Indians, to certain school and swamp lands in the reservations of said Indians in Wisconsin.

The bill provides a method of settling the pending controversies and litigation between the State of Wisconsin and its grantees on the one part and the United States, representing the La Pointe and Lac du Flambeau bands of Indians, on the other, concerning certain swamp and school lands within the boundaries of the reservations of said Indians.

By the act of August 6, 1846 (9 Stat. L., 56), enabling Wisconsin to become a State in the Union, Congress granted to it for school purposes the sixteenth section "in every township of the public lands in said State, and when such section has been sold or otherwise disposed of other lands equivalent thereto and as contiguous as may be shall be granted to said State for the use of schools," and the convention held for that purpose having accepted the terms offered by the enabling act, Wisconsin was admitted into the Union by the act of May 29, 1848 (9 Stat. L., 233).

The reservations referred to in the bill were created by the treaty of September 30, 1854 (10 Stat. L., 1109).

The La Pointe Reservation embraces lands in townships 46 to 48 north, ranges 1 to 4 west, the lands having been surveyed on various dates from 1855 to 1873. The plats of survey show the following sections numbered 16 in the La Pointe Reservation:

Sec. 16, T. 46 N., R. 2 W., contains 640 acres; 240 acres thereof have been allotted to Indians and patents issued thereon in accordance with the direction of the department.

Sec. 16, T. 47 N., R. 2 W., contains 640 acres; 320 acres thereof have also been allotted and patented to Indians.

Sec. 16, T. 47 N., R 1 W., is not shown on the plat of survey, but apparently contains 640 acres.

Sec. 16, T. 46 N., R. 3 W., contains 640 acres; 240 acres thereof have also been allotted and patented to Indians.

The Lac du Flambeau Reservation embraces lands in townships 39 to 41 north, ranges 4 to 6 east, the surveys having been made on various dates from 1860 to 1865.

The approved plats of survey of this reservation show sections numbered 16, as follows:

Sec. 16, T. 40 N., R. 5 E., contains 350.70 acres.
Sec. 16, T. 41 N., R. 5 E., contains 587.05 acres.
Sec. 16, T. 41 N., R. 4 E., contains 640 acres.

The total area of sections numbered 16 in this reservation is 1,577.75 acres.

These matters of detail are mentioned because of the ruling of this department and the courts that the grant to the States in support of common schools does not attach until the lands are surveyed in the field, and that prior to such time the right of the State to a specific location may be defeated by reason of the Government's making other disposition thereof. (See Cooper v. Roberts, 18 How., 173; Heydenfeldt v. Daney Gold, etc., Co., 93 U. S., 634; Minnesota v. Hitchcock, 185 U. S., 373; Wisconsin v. Hitchcock, 201 U. S., 202; State of Colorado, 6 L. D., 413; Barnhurst v. State of Utah, 30 L. D., 314; State of South Dakota v. Trinity Gold Mining Co., 34 L. D., 485.)

Applying the principle above announced, it will be seen that the permanent reservations for these Indians were created prior to the survey of the lands by the Government and that as the State's title under the school grant could not attach until the survey was made such title has never obtained. The Supreme Court of the United States has so decided in a comparatively recent case, that of Wisconsin v. Hitchcock, supra. However, the court seems to have based its decision, not so much upon the fact that the permanent reservation was created before the survey of the lands in the field, but because of the right of occupancy granted the Indians prior to the date of the act by which Wisconsin was enabled to become a State. In this regard, some difficulty is experienced in reconciling the decision in this case with the decision in the case of Beecher v. Weatherby (95 U. S., 517), because, in the latter case, the court held specifically that the mere right of occupancy granted the Indians by the earlier treaties did not defeat the grant to the State by the later act of 1846. However, as stated above, the conclusion reached in the State of Wisconsin v. Hitchcock seems justified by the fact that the survey was not made until after the lands were included in an Indian reservation.

Speaking generally, it may be said that the school sections were embraced in what are known as permanent Indian reservations prior to the time of their survey, and the State's rights under the school grant did not for that reason attach, but the State is unquestionably entitled, both under the enabling act of 1846 and the later act of February 28, 1891 (26 Stat. L., 796), to select indemnity or to await the possible termination of the Indian reservation and take the school sections in place in the event that they are not in the meantime allotted to the Indians.

In this connection I wish to say that in order to test the validity of the State's claims under the school grant, eight allotments of 80 acres each in section 16, T. 46 N., R. 2 W., in the La Pointe Reservation, were made, and having been approved by the department on June 26, 1907, as provided by the treaty of September 30, 1854, supra, patents were duly issued. Thereupon the J. S. Stearns Lumber Company filed suit in the circuit court at Ashland, Wis., against two of the allottees for the purpose of quieting title, and this department, in October, 1908, requested the Department of Justice to defend the Indians' rights. This department is not advised of the present status of these suits.

By the act of September 28, 1850 (9 Stat. L., 519), Congress granted to the several States all the swamp and overflowed lands within their respective boundaries, to the end that they might be reclaimed.

The records of the General Land Office show that, approximately, 18,000 acres in the Lac du Flambeau Reservation were included in the list of swamp lands reported to that office on October 22, 1866, and an additional amount of 21,000 acres was included in the report submitted by the commission appointed to determine swamp lands; that something over 9,000 acres in the La Pointe Reservation were selected as swamp on July 30, 1870, and approved as such on April 24, 1871, but no patents have been issued therefor; that 13,000 acres were selected at the same time, which selection has not been approved; and that in addition to these lands approximately 2,500 acres were included as swamp in the report of the commission, which is referred to above.

I do not find that the swamp-land grant in Wisconsin has been the subject of any decision by the Supreme Court of the United States. That tribunal, however, has rendered decisions construing generally the swamp-land grant made by the act of 1850, the most important of which is that in the case of Wright v. Roseberry (121 U. S., 488). In this case the court distinctly held that the swamp grant was one in præsenti, vesting in the State proprio vigore, from the day of its passage title to all the land of the particular description therein designated, wanting nothing but the definition of the boundaries to make it perfect. If we apply the observations of the court in the case of Wisconsin v. Hitchcock, supra, respecting the force of the right of occupancy by the Indians, and following the rule announced therein to its logical conclusion, it may be held that such swamp lands as were subject to this right of occupancy may be allotted to the Indians, and in this manner the State's title under the swamp grant might be defeated.

On December 19, 1894, the Secretary of the Interior instructed the General Land Office that there should be no approvals of selections of swamp land by the State of Wisconsin as long as the Indian reservations were in existence. In re the State of Wisconsin (19 L. D., 518) this department held that while the State of Wisconsin acquired the naked fee to the swamp lands in the several reservations the same was subject to the right of Indian occupancy, and that no action should be taken looking to the disturbance of the Indians' rights while the same existed. Such is the status of these lands as held by this department and the courts.

I see no objection, however, to the appointment of a commission, as provided in the bill, for the consideration of the conflicting claims of the State of Wisconsin and its grantees and the United States representing the La Pointe and Lac du Flambeau bands of Chippewa Indians, and the making of an agreement by the Secretary of the Interior with the State of Wisconsin and its grantees for their settlement, subject to the approval of Congress; and, in fact, I think that the consideration of the matter, as provided by the bill, will afford a satisfactory conclusion to a much-vexed question that has harassed this department for many years, provided the State will, by proper authority, consent to the proposed plan of settlement.

Very respectfully, R. A. BALLINGER, Secretary.

Hon. MOSES E. CLAPP,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I understand from the Senator from Wisconsin that no action can be taken until it comes back to Congress.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg pardon.

Mr. SCOTT. As I understand your explanation, there can be no action until the matter comes back to Congress.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No action will be taken settling titles——

Mr. SCOTT. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (continuing). Until the whole matter is referred back to Congress and Congress confirms the report of the Secretary of the Interior.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 4, it is proposed to insert "subject to the approval of Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OREGON TRUNK RAILWAY OF WASHINGTON.

The bill (H. R. 17160) to authorize the Oregon Trunk Railway of the State of Washington to construct a bridge across the Columbia River and Celilo Canal was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BIG SANDY RIVER BRIDGE, KENTUCKY.

The bill (H. R. 19967) to authorize Thomas J. Ewing, George B. Catton, Otto Burger, William Cecil, and Milton E. Foster to construct a bridge across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD C. KITTLE.

The bill (H. R. 970) for the relief of Edward C. Kittle was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in the administration of the pension laws the authorization of the Secretary of War permitting Edward C. Kittle, formerly captain Company D, Sixty-first New York Volunteers, to reenter the service shall be held and considered as an honorable discharge from his service with that command.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RASMUS K. HAFSOS.

The bill (S. 4473) for the relief of Rasmus K. Hafsos was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Rasmus K. Hafsos, of Aberdeen, S. Dak., $2,560, in settlement of his claim for payment of amount withheld as liquidated damages under a certain contract for the construction of certain buildings for Indian school purposes at Bismarck, N. Dak.

Mr. BACON. Is there a report accompanying the bill? If so; and if it is not too long, I should like to hear it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

Mr. GAMBLE rose.

Mr. BACON. Possibly the Senator from South Dakota can make a statement that will answer my purpose.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I think it will be sufficient for the Secretary to read the letter from the Secretary of the Interior, which appears as a part of the report. It fully discloses the facts and justifies, I think, favorable consideration of the bill.

A contract for the construction of certain school buildings at Bismarck, N. Dak., was entered into by the claimant, and, under the contract, if there was a delay in the completion of the buildings, there was a penalty of $40 per day. The delay was occasioned by the inability of the railways to carry the material, also from the scarcity of material and delay in supplying it, and on account of the limited supply of labor. The evidence submitted shows the contractor was without fault and in no sense was the Government prejudiced. The buildings were ready in ample time for occupancy. The delinquency was for sixty-four days, and at $40 per day provided by the contract, it amounted to $2,560, the amount named in the bill.

Mr. KEAN. I suggest to the Senator that he allow the Secretary to read the last paragraph of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes; of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BACON. This is simply for the remission of the penalty? Is that all?

Mr. GAMBLE. It is simply for the remission of the penalty. There was no loss to the Government because the buildings, as I understand, would not have been occupied at an earlier date even had they been completed within the time specified in the contract.

Mr. BACON. I will not ask for the reading of the report.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEWART & CO.

The bill (S. 2441) for the relief of the next of kin of Stewart & Co. and the heirs of C. A. Weed, for whom A. P. H. Stewart was agent, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen, consider, and adjust, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding, the claims of Stewart & Co., and

A. P. H. Stewart, agent, for internal-revenue taxes alleged to have been illegally collected between January 1, 1865, and January 1, 1866, on cotton purchased from the Government by the claimant and which taxes have not heretofore been refunded; and if it shall appear that said taxes were illegally collected then and in that event there shall be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, by way of refund, an amount not exceeding $11,208.04, said sum to be paid to the next of kin of C. A. Weed and to the legal representatives of A. P. H. Stewart, formerly copartners, trading under the firm names of Stewart & Co., and A. P. H. Stewart, agent; which sum shall be in full settlement of all claims of said parties for internal-revenue taxes illegally collected on cotton purchased from the Government by the claimants during the period aforesaid and not heretofore refunded.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

LAWTON AND FORT SILL ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

The bill (S. 5905) to authorize the Lawton and Fort Sill Electric Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Fort Sill Military Reservation, and for other purposes, was announced as the next business in order, and was read.

Mr. KEAN. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. DICK on the 24th instant.

Mr. KEAN. The Secretary need not read any further. I have read the illuminating remarks of the Secretary of War, and I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator has no objection to it.

Mr. KEAN. I have just said that I have no objection to the bill after reading the illuminating remarks of the Secretary of War.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 6, after the word "operate" to strike out the article "a;" and in line 9, after the word "such," to strike out "line or lines" and insert "terms and in such location," so as to make the section read:

That the Lawton and Fort Sill Electric Railway Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Oklahoma, be, and the same is hereby, empowered to survey, locate, construct, and maintain and operate railway, telegraph, telephone, and trolley lines through the Fort Sill Military Reservation in Comanche County, State of Oklahoma, upon such terms and in such location as may be determined and approved by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, section 2, line 1, after the words "authorized to," to strike out "take" and insert "occupy;" in line 10, after the word "be," to strike out "taken" and insert "occupied;" and in line 18, after the word "be," to strike out "taken" and insert "occupied or used," so as to read:

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to occupy and use for all purposes of railway, telegraph, telephone, and trolley lines, and for no other purpose, a right of way 50 feet in width through said Fort Sill Military Reservation, with the right to use such additional ground where cuts and fills may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the roadbed, not exceeding 100 feet in width or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no part of the land herein authorized to be occupied shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railway, telegraph, telephone, and trolley lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used such portion shall revert to the United States: Provided further, That before the said railway company shall be permitted to enter upon any part of said military reservation, a description by metes and bounds of the land herein authorized to be occupied or used shall be approved by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. E. MOORE.

The bill (S. 2419) for the relief of C. E. Moore was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Postmaster-General to cause the accounts of C. E. Moore, late postmaster at Cherryvale, Kans., to be credited with the sum of $130, being on account of the loss of $130 in postal funds lost by the failure of the Cherryvale National Bank, of Cherryvale, Kans.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RESURVEYS OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 116) to amend an act to correct chapter 271 of volume 35, United States Statutes at Large, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the chapter referred to so as to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to cause to be made such resurveys or retracements of the surveys of public lands as, after full investigation, he may deem essential to properly mark the boundaries of the public lands remaining undisposed of, with the limitation that not to exceed 20 per cent of the total annual appropriation for surveys and resurveys of the public lands shall be used for the resurveys and retracements.

Mr. BACON. I should like to have the Senator who is in charge of the measure state what reason there is for this large increase.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is to correct an error in the enrollment of a bill passed at the last session of Congress, and the correction leaves it exactly as the two Houses agreed upon it in the conference report. They agreed upon the words "twenty per centum," and the bill was enrolled at "five per centum."

Mr. BACON. Was that the original law upon the subject, or was it an amendment to a previous law?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The law is made from year to year in the appropriation bill. In the appropriation for surveys there is always a provision that a certain amount of the money so appropriated may be used for the retracement and resurvey of land already surveyed.

Mr. BACON. The question I desire to have information upon from the honorable Senator is whether the law as it existed prior to the one in which he says there was a mistake was for that amount or was it for 20 per cent? Was it 5 per cent prior to that time?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not think it has been uniform.

Mr. BACON. I want to know what is the reason for the great increase. If there was an increase in the prior bill, it was for the same reason as now, and I want to know what that reason is.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No. I do not think there was any increase, but the fact of the matter is that Congress agreed that 20 per cent of the amount provided for surveys could be applied to resurveys, and in the enrollment the "twenty per centum" was made "five per centum."

Mr. BACON. I quite understood that, but I did not understand whether that was an increase on similar amounts previously provided for in other bills or whether it was the same.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not think it could possibly be the same, because the amounts vary with the necessity of the service from year to year. I can ascertain for the Senator by looking back through the various appropriation acts. The purpose of this joint resolution——

Mr. BACON. I have no special interest in it except that when I first made the inquiry I supposed it was in the nature of an amendment to previous acts.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, no.

Mr. BACON. I supposed it was a change from previous yearly provisions in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I suppose very likely it was a change, because it is seldom that appropriations for specific objects carry the same amounts each year. It depends on the necessity of the service.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, in committee certain members of the committee reserved the right to oppose the report made upon this measure. A member of the committee will bear me out in that statement. We feel inclined to carry our opposition into the present consideration of the measure.

In the gross amount appropriated for public surveys the sum was fixed—it is the general phrase—as to how much might be used for resurveys. A resurvey, of course, is based upon the fact that there has once been a survey of the land. Congress had been appropriating money, I think I am safe in saying between two and three hundred thousand dollars, in special appropriations for resurveys of land in the States where the surveys had practically been of the whole area.

Mr. WARREN. Not so much as that.

Mr. HEYBURN. One of them was $120,000, I think. There were large appropriations made for resurveys independent of the provisions of the act. Under the rule of the department they had been exercising a certain right to apportion the money between surveys and resurveys. There are certain States that have once been almost entirely surveyed. Colorado, I think, was surveyed up to within 92 per cent, Wyoming is surveyed up to more than 90 per cent, and so on. But other States are, some of them, surveyed up to only about 18 per cent of the survey, and others 24 per cent, and another one 42 per cent.

It seems only just to say that the States which have never been surveyed should be given first consideration; in other words, that the entire aggregate amount of the appropriation of $200,000 should not be, any of it, or, if any at all, only a very small per cent of it, used for making surveys that have once been made. When a survey has once been made and the posts set upon the ground the county surveyor, under the laws of every State and Territory of which I have any knowledge, and I think I am correct in saying under the laws of all of them, may reestablish destroyed or lost corners. There is always enough of any survey remaining to afford a basis for reestablishing the lines.

Now, that is done under local laws or at the expense of the person whose interest it is to find out where his land is situated. But the settlers who go upon the public lands are interested in finding the surveys made and the plats filed, in order that they may file their entry, because land is not subject to entry until after it has been surveyed and the plats filed. When the plats are filed they file with reference to the plats in the office, and if their lines have been obscured or destroyed they can be reestablished.

But if you take 20 per cent of the appropriation made for the survey of public lands and use it to establish or resurvey lands that have been once surveyed, you do it at the expense of the settlement of the country, and you do it at the expense of the States that are entitled to have their lands at least once surveyed before we begin to survey lands more than once.

For that reason we have reserved the right upon the floor to oppose this measure, because whatever the recollection of men may be in regard to it is not very material; the present law says that not more than 5 per cent of the appropriation shall be used for resurveys.

It is said that is a mistake. The Senate committee reported in favor of 5 per cent; the Senate passed it at 5 per cent; and the conferees, either under the pressure of conditions about which we know nothing or for reasons that we know not, claimed that they fixed it at 20 per cent.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator is not correct in it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Who did fix it at 20 per cent?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The conferees and the Senate——

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. One moment. I propose to answer that now.

Mr. HEYBURN. Am I speaking in the Senator's time?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. You are.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, I yield the floor until I can have it in my own right.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator says the conferees claim it was fixed at 20 per cent. There is no claim about it. It was fixed, the Senator well knows it was fixed, by the conferees at 20 per cent, and as such was passed into law so far as the two bodies could pass it. Now, the Senator gets unduly excited——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am not excited; and I am tired of that old saw. The Senator has been too long in the public service not to know better than to attack the integrity of a man's speech in that way. I claim the right, and I shall exercise it, to speak earnestly on this floor; and I shall resent the charge that I am speaking in heat.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, the fact of this matter is one that need not concern the Senator to the extent to which he has gone by stating that certain conferees claimed that things were done. Certain things were done.

The Senator is a great stickler for the proper way to enact laws and for the proper way and the proper time to address the Senate and the country upon those laws. It occurs to me that the time to have opposed this 20 per cent was when the conference report was under consideration.

I am not sure but that the Senator did oppose it at that time; but notwithstanding that fact, it is not a question as to what States are entitled to surveys or to resurveys. I am very thankful the State of Wyoming is surveyed as far as it is surveyed, and I think the money has been well expended. I wish that the State of Idaho were equally covered with public surveys.

But the situation is exactly this: The Congress of the United States at its last session determined that 20 per cent might be used in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior for the retracement and the resurvey of surveys already made. So far as Congress can settle it, it was settled at that time.

The effect of the opposition to this joint resolution is not to allow the Senate and the House of Representatives to make laws for the Nation, but to allow an enrolling clerk to make laws for the Nation. The action of Congress, as it appears upon the statute books now, is the law as it was made by an enrolling clerk and not the law as it was made by the Senate and House of Representatives.

So far as I am concerned, it is a matter of total indifference whether this correction is made or is not made, but I think, for the integrity of our own proceedings, what the Senate and House of Representatives put on the statute books should express exactly what we have expressed by our votes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not think there is any difference in regard to the facts or the statement of facts between the Senator from Wyoming and myself in this matter. The House passed the measure, as I understand it, at 20 per cent. The Senate passed it at 5 per cent. Somewhere in conference the Senate yielded to the House. It came in here as conference reports very often come in, I presume. The RECORD will show the real facts. The conference report was adopted, perhaps without consideration, perhaps after consideration; I do not know. The Senator may remember about it. Certain it is that it came before this body under such circumstances as I will not say deceived, but as misled those who were insisting upon not more than 5 per cent of this fund being used for the purpose of resurveys.

Now, the proposition is that it became a law for us through the misconduct of some enrolling clerk somewhere in the clerical treatment of the bill, and it is proposed by a joint resolution to condemn that clerk, either as to his efficiency or otherwise; and no testimony is brought in. The conference report, it appears, contained a provision that 20 per cent of this fund should be used for resurveys. I do not know whether it did or not; but some clerk in enrolling the bill is charged with having changed that to 5 per cent, the provision that the Senate incorporated into the bill.

There is the whole story, and the question is whether or not we are going to repeal a law, even though it was wrongfully enacted in that way. There should have been some testimony in regard to it. Perhaps the figures in the report of the conference committee might be proven to have been a mistake of the clerk; I do not know. That is just as liable to be the case. They certainly do not agree with the enrolled bill. Now, which is correct? Did the clerk of the conference committee make the mistake or did the clerk enrolling the bill make the mistake? That is the question.

I am not willing that an additional 20 per cent of the inadequate sum of money appropriated for public surveys should be withdrawn from the survey of lands that have never been surveyed and used for the purpose of resurveying lands that have been surveyed and paid for. I am not willing to see it done. I propose to vote against it. I want the Senate, so far as I can contribute to their information on this subject, to be informed as to whether or not we are going to accept a statement, of course made in good faith and believed to be true by those who make it. But there was no testimony taken as to which of the clerks made the mistake. Nobody who was a member of the conference committee has testified that he recollects the conclusion of the conference committee. No one pretends to do so. They find in the conference report 20 per cent, four times as much as the Senate recommended by its vote. They find it there. It is more favorable to those who want resurveys, but it is not fair. There should have been some responsible statement here by members of the conference committee as to what they agreed upon. Then there should have been a statement from both these clerks—the clerk of the conference committee and the clerk who enrolled the bill. We have nothing except a statement, not of the parties who were actors, as I understand it. I will inquire if the Senator from Wyoming was a member of the conference committee?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Wyoming is unable to recollect whether he was on the conference committee or not.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yet, in the face of an enrolled bill, signed by the President of the United States, we are asked to change it, when the Senator from Wyoming does not recollect even whether he was a member of the conference committee or not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It would make no difference whether the Senator from Wyoming was a member of the conference committee or not; the report of the conference committee, signed individually, is in the possession of the Senate. That report shows the facts as I have stated them, and the Senator has not attempted to indicate that they show any other facts.

As to the clerks, the Senator knows very well that a clerk of a conference committee is something almost unheard of in bills of this sort. There are none.

Mr. HEYBURN. It has not been brought to the attention of the Senate that any proceedings were had when the conference report was made. It may be that while the conference report does contain 20 per cent, it will appear from the record of the proceedings had in this body that the conference report was sent back or amended or changed; I do not know.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the joint resolution may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over. The Secretary will state the next business on the calendar.

LANDS IN WYOMING.

The bill (S. 1866) providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BACON. I suppose there is good reason for the bill. I hope the Senator from Wyoming will explain it.

Mr. WARREN. There is the best of reasons for it. In the construction of the various reclamation works sections 36 and 16, which became, under the statutes, the property of the State as regular school sections, are oftentimes necessary to the Government for reservoir sites and ditch and dam rights of way. In other places the usefulness of whole sections or parts of sections of state lands is destroyed by reservoirs, ditches, and dams built or to be built by the Government. If such lands needed by the Government were put up by the State at auction some of them would bring from the Government quite a sum of money. In other cases the State would be harmed very much by destroying sections 36 and 16, or selected indemnity lands, by the dams and flood gates that are used in the reclamation projects. This proposition of exchange is something the Interior Department has indorsed and desires to have put upon the statute book.

Mr. BACON. How much land does it involve?

Mr. WARREN. About 9,600 acres of regular sections 16 and 36, school lands, and a little over 5,000 acres or, perhaps, 5,500 of selected indemnity lands. It is to be an even exchange, acre for acre.

Mr. SHIVELY. Let me ask the Senator from Wyoming a question. I understand that these are lands on which reclamation projects are being carried forward.

Mr. WARREN. They are lands largely desired for that purpose and for other purposes of like character. As I said, sections 16 and 36 are in place wherever they may fall by the surveys. The 5,000 acres are lands that have been selected as indemnity lands, and are located largely along streams. These selected lands come in the way of these main canals to a considerable extent.

Mr. SHIVELY. Sections 16 and 36 are dedicated to public-school purposes.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SHIVELY. And these lands being used for reclamation purposes, the Senator desires to have other lands within this State available?

Mr. WARREN. For the same purpose.

Mr. SHIVELY. That is, for public schools?

Mr. WARREN. And transferred from sections 16 and 36 to such other lands as may be selected in lieu of sections 16 and 36, where used or taken by the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANDERSONVILLE NATIONAL CEMETERY LAND.

The bill (H. R. 10106) authorizing the acceptance by the United States Government from the Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, of a proposed gift of land contiguous to the Andersonville National Cemetery, in the State of Georgia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUMERAL DENNIS.

The bill (S. 6496) to correct the military record of Sumeral Dennis was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment.

Mr. SHIVELY. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a report.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have in my hand a copy of the report.

Mr. SHIVELY. Was Mr. Dennis a soldier of the war of 1812?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHIVELY. I do not request the reading of the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 1, line 10, after the words "eighteen hundred and fifteen," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue or become payable by virtue of the passage of this act—

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of Sumeral Dennis, a private of Capt. Jonathan Beatty's company, First (Mean's) Regiment South Carolina Militia, war of 1812, to show that said Dennis enlisted January 15, 1815, and was honorably discharged therefrom on February 21, 1815: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue or become payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to the bill, but I should like to know whether the individual is still alive.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The War Department tried to kill him twice and he survived and went into three wars. The last one was the Mexican war. He finally died when 102 years old. We want to be sure he did not die in 1815.

Mr. SHIVELY. It is for the benefit of his descendants, I suppose, that this action is taken.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the next bill on the calendar, being the bill (H. R. 18162) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

FRUITA, COLO.

The bill (S. 1877) to grant certain lands to the town of Fruita, Colo., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 2, at the beginning of the line, to strike out the words "and behoof forever," so as to make the section read:

That the following-described tract of land, situate in the county of Mesa and State of Colorado, namely, sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16, or so much thereof as may be desired, in township 14 south, range 102 west of the sixth principal meridian, containing 7,680 acres, more or less, be, and the same is hereby, granted and conveyed to the town of Fruita, in the county of Mesa and in the State of Colorado, upon the payment of $1.25 per acre by said town to the United States, to have and to hold to its use for purposes of water storage and the supply of water for the use of said town; and for these purposes the town of Fruita shall forever have the right, in its discretion, to control and use any and all parts of the premises herein conveyed, subject to the existing laws and regulations concerning the preservation of forest reserves, and in the construction of reservoirs, laying such pipes and mains, and in making such improvements as may be necessary to utilize the water contained in any natural or constructed reservoirs upon such premises: Provided, however, That the grant hereby made is, and the patent issued hereunder shall be, subject to all legal rights heretofore acquired by any person or persons in or to the above-described premises, or any part thereof, and now existing under and by virtue of the laws of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 18, after the word "lands," to insert "other than matured, dead, and down timber," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That nothing herein shall authorize the cutting or removal of timber from said lands, other than matured, dead, and down timber, and it shall be the duty of the town of Fruita on accepting this grant to provide for the proper protection of the forests on the same, and said lands shall not be used for any purpose save that of the protection of the water supply: Provided, That said town shall not have the right to sell, convey, or lease the land herein granted, or any part thereof, or to devote the same to any other purpose than as hereinbefore described.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I inquire if the bill provides for paying $1.25 for the whole tract or an acre?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. One dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 28, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 25, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., delivered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we bless Thy holy name for that subtle, indefinable something we all know, and which we call love, the golden link which binds us together into families, which makes home the dearest spot on earth; the bond of true friendship, the inspiration to patriotism, which makes the real citizen and the true statement; the basis of pure religion, which flowers in philanthropy, charity, and justice to all. Give us, O God, we beseech Thee, more love that we may have less hate, more love that we may have less revenge, more love that we may have less jealousy, more love that we may become God-like. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

UNAVAILABLE BALANCE IN THE TREASURY.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present to the House two letters from the Secretary of the Treasury, giving a full statement of the facts in regard to the unavailable balance, which has been discussed here at this session on several occasions, and ask that the same be printed as a document and be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] asks unanimous consent to print certain communications from the Secretary of the Treasury touching the matter referred to, as a document, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What are you going to do with it after you get it printed?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Secretary of the Treasury makes certain recommendations with a view of disposing of it, so far as the books of the Treasury are concerned, and he asked that consideration be given it at this time. In order that it may be considered, I thought it ought to be printed as a document, and it has been suggested that it also ought to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to printing the same in the RECORD and also as a document and referring the same to the Committee on Appropriations?

There was no objection.

The communications are as follows:

[House Document No. 271, Sixty-first Congress, second session.]

UNAVAILABLE FUNDS, UNITED STATES TREASURY.

LETTER FROM THE ACTING SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, TRANSMITTING A COMMUNICATION FROM THE TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES RELATING TO ITEMS OF UNAVAILABLE FUNDS REPORTED IN HIS GENERAL ACCOUNT.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 15, 1910.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication from the Treasurer of the United States, relating to items of unavailable funds reported in his general account.

This communication sets forth the history of the deposits of public moneys, amounting to $28,101,644.91, made with the States under the provisions of the act of JUNE 23, 1836, and subsequent legislation taking the control of these funds from the Treasury Department.

It seems desirable and important that the Congress should enact legislation that will finally dispose of said deposits, and my recommendation is made for such action.

Respectfully,

CHARLES D. NORTON,
Acting Secretary.

HON. JAMES A. TAWNEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, February 15, 1910.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to submit for your consideration a statement relating to the deposits of public moneys, amounting to $28,101,644.91, made with the States under the provisions of the act of June 23, 1836, sections 13 and 14 of which are as follows:

"SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st day of January, 1837, reserving the sum of $5,000,000, shall be deposited with such of the several States, in proportion to their respective representation in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, as shall, by law, authorize their treasurers or other competent authorities to receive the same on the terms hereinafter specified; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver the same to such treasurers, or other competent authorities, on receiving certificates of deposit therefor, signed by such competent authorities, in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary aforesaid; which certificates shall express the usual and legal obligations and pledge the faith of the States receiving the same, to pay the said moneys, and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of defraying any wants of the Public Treasury, beyond the amount of the five millions aforesaid: Provided, That if any State declines to receive its proportion of the surplus aforesaid, on the terms before named, the same shall be deposited with the other States agreeing to accept the same on deposit in the proportion aforesaid: And provided further, That when said money, or any part thereof, shall be wanted by the said Secretary to meet appropriations by law, the same shall be called for, in ratable proportions within one year, as nearly as conveniently may be, from the different States with which the same is deposited, and shall not be called for in sums exceeding $10,000 from any one State in any one month without previous notice of thirty days for every additional sum of $20,000 which may at any time be required.

"SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the said deposits shall be made with the said States in the following proportions, and at the following times, to wit: One-quarter part on the 1st day of January, 1837, or as soon thereafter as may be; one-quarter part on the 1st day of April, one-quarter part on the 1st day of July, and one-quarter part on the 1st day of October, all in the same year."

The amounts of public moneys transferred to and deposited with the respective States under the foregoing provisions were as follows:

Maine	$955,838.25
New Hampshire	669,086.79
Vermont	669,086.79
Massachusetts	1,338,173.58
Connecticut	764,670.60
Rhode Island	382,335.30
New York	4,014,520.71
Pennsylvania	2,867,514.78
New Jersey	764,670.60
Ohio	2,007,260.34
Indiana	860,254.44
Illinois	477,919.14
Michigan	286,751.49
Delaware	286,751.49
Maryland	955,838.25
Virginia	2,198,427.99
North Carolina	1,433,757.39
South Carolina	1,051,422.09
Georgia	1,051,422.09
Alabama	669,086.79
Louisiana	477,919.14
Mississippi	382,335.30
Tennessee	1,433,757.39
Kentucky	1,433,757.39
Missouri	382,335.30
Arkansas	286,751.49
Total	28,101,644.91

These deposits represent but three of the installments provided for in section 14 of the act of June 23, 1836; when the time arrived for making the transfer of the fourth installment the necessities of the General Government were such that it became necessary to postpone such transfer, which was done by Congress in the following enactment (act of Oct. 2, 1837):

"Be it enacted, etc., That the transfer of the fourth installment of deposits directed to be made with the States under the thirteenth section of the act of June 23, 1836, be, and the same is hereby, postponed till the 1st day of January, 1839: Provided, That the three first installments under the said act shall remain on deposit with the States until otherwise directed by Congress."

You will observe that by this enactment the transfer to the States of the fourth installment was not only postponed, but also that control of the first three installments previously transferred to and deposited with the States was taken from the Secretary of the Treasury, and that the amounts thereof were to remain on deposit with the States until otherwise directed by the Congress.

The Congress in assuming direct control of these deposits by this enactment excepted them from movement under the laws governing public moneys deposited in the general account to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, viz:

"All public moneys paid into any depository shall be subject to the draft of the Treasurer of the United States, drawn agreeably to appropriations made by law. (Sec. 3593, R. S.)

"The Secretary of the Treasury may, except as provided in the next section (3641), transfer the moneys in the hands of any depositary of public moneys to the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Treasurer; and he may transfer moneys in the hands of one depositary to any other depositary, as the safety of the public moneys and the convenience of the public service shall seem to him to require." (Sec. 3640, R. S.)

The Government has on several occasions since 1837 been very much in need of money to pay the ordinary expenses, yet the Congress has never reinvested the Secretary of the Treasury with authority to recall to the Treasury the public moneys deposited with the States. And now, seventy-three years after the last enactment relating to these deposits, it may be safely assumed that the Congress will not authorize the recall of these deposits to the Treasury. For many years they have been stated as "unavailable funds" in the annual reports of the Treasurer of the United States. They form a part of the general account, and are so stated quarterly by the Treasurer.

There is no way by which these deposits, anomalous in character, can be taken out of the general account under existing law; therefore I have to request that recommendation be made to the Congress, in such manner as you may deem advisable, for legislation that will relieve the Treasurer of further accountability for said deposits with the States.

Respectfully, yours, LEE MCCLUNG,
Treasurer of the United States.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 15, 1910.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication from the Treasurer of the United States relating to items of public moneys that have been lost without fault or negligence on the part of the Treasurer.

This letter narrates in detail the items of unavailable funds representing losses by deficit, by default, by failure of depository banks, etc., amounting to $1,585,154.24. In previous years the Congress has been asked several times for legislation that will relieve the Treasurer from further accountability for moneys that have been lost or become unavailable without fault or negligence on the part of the Treasurer. Such legislation has not been enacted; therefore the attention of the Congress is again invited to the subject, and it is recommended that provision be made for the elimination of these unavailable funds from the general account by authorizing a credit to the Treasurer of the United States and a corresponding charge upon the personal account books of the department against the defaulting officer or depositary who fails to pay the money on demand.

Respectfully, CHARLES D. NORTON,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, February 15, 1910.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the items of unavailable funds reported in the general account of the Treasurer of the United States, amounting to $1,547,877.18, which, by deficit, by default, by theft in various places, by neglect of administrative officers in the mints of the United States, by failure of national banks designated as depositories of public moneys, and by shortages discovered in transfers of public moneys between offices, have gone from the control of the Treasurer of the United States through no fault or negligence on the part of the Treasurer, and which sums he can not, from the nature of the case, account for and thereby obtain credit therefor on the books of the department.

The first of these items occurred at the mint of the United States at San Francisco in 1856, and the other items at various dates since that year, as will appear in the following narrative giving the history of each of said items of unavailable funds.

UNAVAILABLE FUNDS IN SUBTREASURY OFFICES.

The reports on examinations of subtreasuries and correspondence in relation to deficits and shortages therein are filed in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury (Division of Public Moneys).

Assistant treasurer of the United States, New Orleans, La., 1867 ..... $680,891.53

Special agents of the Treasury Department made an examination of the office and accounts of William R. Whitaker, assistant treasurer of the United States at New Orleans, La., in May, 1867, and found him to be a defaulter for more than $1,000,000, but which has since been reduced by recoveries to the amount above stated. Proceedings were instituted in the courts against said Whitaker, and upon the trial he was acquitted.

Assistant treasurer of the United States, New Orleans, La., 1886 ..... $328.80

This item represents the net amount of "shorts" that were discovered in the count of $10,000,000 in silver dollars transferred from New Orleans to the Treasury Department in 1886. The amount was reported to the assistant treasurer of the United States at New Orleans (Mr. Samuel Flower) with the request to credit that sum ($328.80) to the Treasurer, which he refused to do, and the item has since been carried in the transit account.

Assistant treasurer of the United States, New Orleans, La., 1895 ..... $20,959.81

An examination of the office and accounts of P. F. Herwig, assistant treasurer of the United States at New Orleans, was made in June, 1885, and the above shortage was discovered in the cash account of the assorting teller (John H. Aufdemorte). It appears that he deliberately stole the funds of the office and absconded. By subsequent recoveries the amount was reduced to that stated in the foregoing; the said Aufdemorte was apprehended, tried, found guilty, and sentenced to serve a term of years in the penitentiary. Suit has not been entered against the sureties of Mr. Herwig (now deceased) to recover the amount of the shortage.

Assistant treasurer of the United States, St. Louis, Mo., 1906.. $61,500

During the month of October, 1906, an examination was made of the office and accounts of T. J. Akins, assistant treasurer of the United States at St. Louis, and the count of the assets disclosed a shortage as above stated. The deficit was located in the account of the receiving teller (David P. Dyer, jr.). Criminal proceedings were instituted against the said Dyer, and upon trial he was acquitted. Suit against the sureties of Mr. Akins has not been entered for the recovery of the amount of the shortage.

Assistant treasurer of the United States, Boston, Mass., 1907.. $3,000

On June 7, 1907, the assistant treasurer of the United States at Boston (E. M. Curtis) charged in his transcript of the general account a remittance, lot No. 2561, of $105,000 in gold certificates and forwarded the same by express to the Treasurer of the United States. The package was received at the office of the Treasurer in good condition, and was delivered to an experienced and trustworthy counter who opened it and made an inventory of the contents. Finding the inventory correct, the counter then began opening the straps one by one and counting the certificates in each. On opening a strap marked "$30,000," the counter found in it but twenty-seven $1,000 certificates, and immediately called attention to the shortage, which was verified by subsequent recounts, and no offsetting discrepancy was discovered. The assistant treasurer was notified by wire of the shortage of $3,000, and as the result of an investigation made by that officer, criminal proceedings were instituted against an employee of the subtreasury office, but upon trial he was acquitted. Suit against the sureties of the assistant treasurer has not been entered for the recovery of the amount of the shortage.

A part of the moneys in the general account of the Treasurer of the United States is in the immediate custody of the officers in charge of the mints and assay offices, and it is classified as the "bullion fund." (R. S., 3526 and 2545.) Under the provisions of law governing the administration of these institutions (Rev. Stat., Title XXXVII—Coinage, Weights, and Measures) a strict accountability is exacted of the officials in charge of mints. In the operative departments of each mint a fixed allowance for wastage is made by law, reimbursable from the appropriation for operative and incidental expenses. It is the duty of the superintendent of each mint to make adjustments and to keep the bullion fund intact. However, it appears that the bullion fund in the mint at San Francisco has in former years been mismanaged, and as a result several items of deficits are reported in the accounts of that institution, which were described by the Director of the Mint (George E. Roberts), in his annual report for 1898, as follows:

DEFICIENCIES IN THE BULLION ACCOUNTS OF THE MINTS.

Mint at San Francisco.—The first item of shortage in the bullion accounts of this mint occurred in 1856, upon the settlement of the accounts of A. Haraszthy, melter and refiner, when it was found that in his gold operations the wastage was $150,550.70 in excess of the legal limit of allowances, and in his silver operations $1,776.33, making a total wastage of $152,327.03 in excess of the legal allowance. Suit was instituted against Haraszthy and his sureties for the recovery of the amount ($152,327.03) of wastage over the legal allowance, and judgment given for the defendant. It was alleged on the trial that the chimney flue of the refinery as constructed by the Government was defective, permitting gold to escape by volatilization in undue quantity, and also that the assayer upon whose reports the value of the bullion delivered to the melter and refiner was determined was of unsound mind, and his assays were not reliable.

The second item arises from a difference between entries made on the books of the coiner and the treasurer's cashier, of a delivery of coin, December 9, 1865, the coiner charging the treasurer with $120,000 in double eagles, and the cashier crediting the coiner with only $100,000. There is little doubt that the coiner delivered to the cashier the amount, $120,000, claimed by him, as shortly afterwards it was discovered that the cashier was guilty of the embezzlement of other moneys from the mint and had absconded. No suit appears to have been brought against either the coiner or the treasurer for the recovery of this sum, $20,000.

The third item is a loss in gold in the melter and refiner's accounts in 1867, stated to be due to the fraudulent alteration of the assayer's report by a clerk in the office of the treasurer of the mint in increasing the fineness in gold of certain deposits. The clerk was arrested, tried, and acquitted. No suit was ever instituted against the melter and refiner, Mr. J. M. Eckfeldt, deceased, for the recovery of this loss, $7,735.34.

The fourth item is the amount of the net wastage of William Schmolz, coiner, for the fiscal year 1866, and not reimbursed the bullion fund from the appropriation for contingent expenses. As the treasurer of the mint declined to credit or acknowledge the receipt of the $20,000 heretofore referred to, the coiner maintained that he was entitled to credit for that sum, $1,956.21.

The fifth item, annual assay coins for the years 1865, 1866, and 1867, sent to the mint at Philadelphia for test as to their fineness by the annual assay commission, being expended on the request of the superintendent of the mint at San Francisco in the purchase of supplies for the San Francisco mint, and the coinage accounts not reimbursed by a transfer from the appropriation for incidental and contingent expenses for this sum, $21,962.85.

The sixth item, amounting to $195,258.81, arises from the loss on sale of sweeps for a series of years prior to June 31, 1870, and wastage of operative officers, though within the legal limit of allowance. The bullion fund should have been annually reimbursed for these items from the appropriation for incidental and contingent expenses.

The seventh item is the amount claimed by the coiner, William Schmolz, to have been wasted in his gold operations from July 1 to August 14, 1869; disallowed by the accounting officers upon the ground that the wastage claimed was not a bona fide one. No suit appears to have been brought for the recovery of this sum, $14,317.72.

The items above enumerated make the total deficit in the bullion accounts of the mint at San Francisco $413,557.90.

Mint at Philadelphia.—A deficit of $13,543.82 exists in the bullion accounts of the mint at Philadelphia. Of this sum $12,810.02 is the balance due on account of $113,425.85 in gold bullion embezzled in 1893 by Henry Cochran, weigh clerk, not recovered, and the remainder, $733, a shortage found on recount in the number of silver dollars stored in the vaults of that institution. Suit was instituted against the late superintendent, Mr. O. C. Bosbyshell, and the sureties on his bond, for the recovery of the amount of the deficit, and judgment was rendered in favor of the Government for the balance due on account of gold bullion embezzled, but the decision of the court was adverse to the United States on the loss of 733 silver dollars. Mr. Bosbyshell has taken an appeal from the decision of the United States district and circuit courts, holding he was responsible for the balance due the Government on account of gold bullion embezzled, to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the case is still pending.

Action in this case was discontinued when Congress passed a bill for the relief of Mr. Bosbyshell.

The bill for the relief of Mr. Bosbyshell became a law February 2, 1899, and was as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That Oliver C. Bosbyshell, late superintendent of the United States mint at Philadelphia, is hereby relieved and discharged from all liability for the acts of Henry S. Cochran, late weigh clerk of said United States mint at Philadelphia, in the embezzlement or larceny of certain gold bullion bars, the property of the United States aforesaid, and from all liability to account for any and all embezzled or stolen gold bullion bars by the said Henry S. Cochran, as aforesaid, the same having been without the default or negligence of the said Oliver C. Bosbyshell."

It will be seen that the relief given Mr. Bosbyshell by this act was for the balance due on account of the gold bullion embezzled by Henry S. Cochran, amounting to $12,810.82. As this amount was included in the bullion fund and constituted a part of the balance in the general account of the Treasurer of the United States, the Treasurer has raised the question before the accounting officers of the department, and claims that credit should also be given him in his general account, and release him, as well as Mr. Bosbyshell, from further accountability therefor, as it was evidently the intention of Congress to clear the books of this item. The matter is still pending.

Mint at Carson.—A deficiency of $75,549.75 exists on the bullion accounts of this institution, due to the embezzlement of that amount in gold bullion from the melter and refiner's department by John T. Jones, while occupying the position of assistant melter and refiner, and James Heney, silver dissolver in the refinery. Both of these persons were arrested, tried, and convicted, being sentenced to undergo imprisonment at hard labor for a term of eight years and to pay a fine of $5,000.

The embezzlement of the last-named sum was made at various times between January 1, 1891, and June 1, 1894, and was effected by abstraction and the substitution of base silver bullion containing a small percentage of gold. Suit has been instituted and is pending against the estate and sureties of E. B. Zabriskie, deceased, who held the position of melter and refiner of the Carson mint during the period the amount above named was embezzled. The recovery of any part of the amount is very doubtful.

To the foregoing may also be added deficits in the bullion fund in other offices, as reported by this office:

Branch mint at Charlotte, N. C $32,000

There is a balance due from Green W. Caldwell, superintendent and treasurer, and it has been unavailable since the beginning of the war of the rebellion, in 1861.

Branch mint at Dahlonega, Ga $27,950.03

There is a balance due from George W. Kellogg, superintendent and treasurer, and it has been unavailable since the beginning of the war of the rebellion in 1861.

Mint at New Orleans.—The vaults in the mint at New Orleans having become filled with silver dollars, it was determined to remove as many as practicable to the vault in the Treasury Department. In order to avoid the payment of a large sum for transportation, bags said to contain $10,400,000 were moved by means of United States naval vessels in September, 1885, at an expense which saved the Government about $40,000. However, after the arrival of the silver dollars at the Treasury Department they were counted, and "shorts" to the amount of $54 discovered in the shipment. These were reported to Mr. G. Montegut, superintendent of the mint of the United States at New Orleans, with the request to credit the Treasurer of the United States in his bullion fund account with that amount, being "shorts" in the $10,400,000 previously charged. Considerable correspondence passed in relation to the matter, but finally the superintendent refused to give the credit, and since that time the amount, $54, has been carried as an item in transit.

Mint at Philadelphia, recoinage account $77.93

On July 8, 1895, the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York was directed by transfer order No. 27849 to transfer $250,000 in uncurrent subsidiary coin to the mint at Philadelphia for recoinage. In the shipment 1,100 uncurrent standard silver dollars were unintentionally included and counted as subsidiary coin. The superintendent of the mint verified the count when the shipment was received, and proceeded in the usual manner to melt and determine the value of the bullion resulting therefrom, as well as the loss on the recoinage, and submitted a report thereon.

When request was made for reimbursement of the loss, it was refused to the extent of $77.93, the loss on the recoinage of 1,100 standard silver dollars, because Congress had made no appropriation for the recoinage of uncurrent standard silver dollars; and that amount has been reported as "loss on recoinage" in the assets of the mint at Philadelphia since that date. (Request has been made for an appropriation to reimburse this loss.)

DEFICITS IN NATIONAL-BANK DEPOSITORIES.

The Government has employed hundreds of the national banks of the country as depositories of the public moneys, and many of these depositories have failed with public moneys in their possession; but the bonds pledged as security for these public deposits have protected the Government from loss, except in two instances, viz:

Venango National Bank, of Franklin, Pa., a depository of the United States, failed in 1866, and the amount of public moneys carried as unavailable on account of the failure is $181,377.51.

First National Bank, Selma, Ala., a depository of the United States, failed in 1867, and the amount of public moneys carried as unavailable on account of the failure is $33,383.87.

DEFICITS IN DEPOSITORIES OF THE UNITED STATES.

There are some small balances charged to the late depositaries of the United States, which are carried as unavailable funds, viz:

Depositaries of the United States:
Galveston, Tex., 1861	$778.66
Baltimore, Md., 1866	547.50
Pittsburg, Pa., 1867	2,126.11
Santa Fe, N. Mex., 1866	249.90
Total	3,702.17

DEFICITS IN THE ACCOUNT FOR SERVICE OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

At the outbreak of the rebellion in 1861 there were balances to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States for the service of the Post-Office Department, with officers located in States that went into the rebellion. These amounts have not been recovered and are carried as unavailable funds in the Post-Office Department account, viz:

Assistant treasurer of the United States, New Orleans, La., 1861	$31,164.44
Depositaries of the United States:
Savannah, Ga., 1861	205.76
Galveston, Tex., 1861	83.36
Little Rock, Ark., 1861	5,823.50
Total (Post-Office Department account)	37,277.06

RECAPITULATION.

Unavailable funds:
In subtreasuries	$766,680.14
In mints and assay offices	562,733.49
In depository banks	214,761.38
In United States depositories (old)	3,702.17
Total General Treasury	1,547,877.18
In post-office account	37,277.06
Aggregate of deficits, etc	1,585,154.24

Many recommendations have been made by my predecessors in office, with a view to relieve the Treasurer of accountability for amounts that become unavailable without fault or negligence on his part. The whole subject has been gone over time and again with the committees in the Senate and House, and bills have been introduced in both Houses of Congress and reports made thereon that fully explain the matter.

In Senate Report No. 371, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, from the Finance Committee, submitted by the honorable chairman, Senator Sherman, on page 3, reference is made to this question of unavailable moneys, as follows:

"All moneys in the Treasury, wherever it may be deposited or placed for disbursement or custody, is charged to the Treasurer of the United States. It is obvious, however, that this money may be lost without fault on the part of the Treasurer, by robbery, accident, defalcation of a subordinate officer, misconduct of depositaries having it in charge, or otherwise. Still, under the law, the Treasurer is responsible, and is charged with these sums. Such a deficit would, in the accounts of a firm, be a simple plain entry in the profit and loss account by crediting cash and debiting the defaulter. But from the fact before stated that money can not be taken from the Treasury except by an appropriation, this course can not be pursued. An account called 'unavailable' was created, which was charged with the amounts, and the Treasurer credited in his general account through the statement of the account by the accounting officers. This method of relieving the Treasurer is, your committee are informed, a practice which has grown up and is not authorized by law, and for some years past has been prohibited by the comptroller and has been discontinued. It is plain that the Treasurer should be relieved from this responsibility, and that Congress should in some proper way provide by law for the dropping of these unavailable funds, by authorizing a credit to the Treasurer and a corresponding charge against the defaulting officer who fails to pay the money on demand."

And on page 14, as follows:

"All public moneys are received into the Treasury and paid out upon warrants issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer being debited with the amounts received and credited with the amounts paid. This forms what is known as the 'Treasurer's general account,' by which the cash in the Treasury is determined. When a depositary who has public moneys in his possession for which the Treasurer is responsible proves to be a defaulter, this amount becomes unavailable. It has been the practice of the accounting officers in some cases to state an account, charging such defaulting officer on the books of the Treasury with the amount of the defalcation and crediting the Treasurer, but as no money can be drawn from the Treasury except on warrants issued in accordance with the appropriations made by law, there is no way of reconciling these unavailable amounts in the accounts of the Treasury Department, except by crediting the Treasurer in his general account without the issuing of a warrant for such credit.

"As the Treasurer's accounts are not adjusted until long after the publication of the tables contained in the finance report, these items must be regulated subsequently; and whenever they occur, the tables must be changed to this extent. When anything is recovered from such defaulting officers, the amount is charged to the Treasurer in his general account as 'receipts from unavailables,' which also necessitates a further change in the tables to this extent. This defect in the present system has long been felt, but can not be remedied without legislation authorizing these transfers to be made by warrants, and in accordance with an appropriation, and Congress has several times been asked for such legislation."

Notwithstanding the necessity for such legislation, as set forth in this masterly report, Congress has failed to act in the matter, and as the items of unavailable moneys are becoming more numerous, I respectfully request that you recommend such legislation as will accomplish the results desired.

You are advised that there is precedent for such legislation in the act of March 3, 1837 (5 Stat., 178).

Respectfully, yours,

LEE MCCLUNG,
Treasurer of the United States.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report of H. R. 15384, the army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the conference report of the army appropriation bill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement was read at length.

[For conference report and statement, see House proceedings of February 23.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there is an amendment, No. 21, that was not included in the agreement. I ask that the Clerk read amendment No. 21.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, extend the proviso contained under the heading "Retired officers" in the act making appropriation for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, approved March 2, 1907, so as to include any officer who served creditably in the regular or volunteer forces of the United States during the civil war, and who is now and has been for a period of not less than one year serving as a brigadier-general on the active list of the army, and who at date of retirement will have served in the army more than forty years.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this proviso is virtually extending to, I understand, five officers of the army now on the active list the same retirement privileges that were given by the Congress of the United States two or three years ago to four officers who had served as brigadier-generals on the staff in Washington. I am informed that this closes up all of the civil-war men who could have been brigadier-generals and served one year before retirement. This matter was never discussed in the House. It was a proposition that, though we had a precedent for it, the committee of conference did not believe it should bring in any agreement on that would estop the House from expressing itself fully upon the matter. I do not know that I can call the names of all who are affected. One of them is General Marshall, Chief of Engineers, and General Morton, commander of the Department of the Missouri; another General Thomas, now in command of the Department of the Colorado, and there are two others that I can not now recall.

I can only say this, that it has been claimed that these five will close up all who could have had civil-war service and who have served a year as brigadier-general.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if, in recognizing civil-war service, they count the period for which these gentlemen were cadets?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It would in the way that the language is drawn. If we were to leave those words out, "other than as a cadet," and were to provide the same as in the matter of General Humphrey, then Quartermaster-General; General O'Reilly, then Surgeon-General; General Mackenzie, then Chief of Engineers; and General Davis, then Judge-Advocate-General; those words were not in the act.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did these gentlemen have military service aside from that at the academy as cadets?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, yes; all of these men have served in the ranks during the civil war.

Mr. SLAYDEN. All of them had served in the civil war?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; outside of the cadetship; that is my understanding. I know it is true as to General Thomas and General Morton. They served two or three years and carried guns in the civil war as lads, and then went to the academy and graduated after the close of the civil war.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That, I understand, is true as to General Marshall, except as to the length of time.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. General Marshall served as a private in a Kentucky cavalry regiment during the civil war, and then was appointed a cadet at West Point after the war.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Can the gentleman recall the names of the others?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not at this time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Would General Hall be one of them?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. My understanding is the other two men had actual civil-war service.

Mr. SULZER. With the permission of my colleague, I can say that the officers who will be affected, provided this proviso should become law, are General Thomas, General Morton, General Hodges, General Brush, and General Marshall, and none others.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will say that The Adjutant-General of the Army, whom I have always found exactly correct in all information he ever gave me, claims that that is all who can possibly come in.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Who does that?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The Adjutant-General.

I will say this: As an original proposition I assume that the House should have hesitated as to the adoption of this provision; but having set the example, there is no more reason why it should not be adopted than any other legislation where a precedent has been so clearly established.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. Can the gentleman state how many officers there are on the active list of the army below the rank of brigadier-general who have served in the civil war?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think there are a good many colonels and below, but there is no place where they can go into the position of brigadier-general and serve a year before their retirement. In other words, every colonel who had civil-war service becomes a brigadier on retirement. If these men did not become brigadiers on the active list, they would become brigadiers on retirement. This is to give them one grade higher. It costs the Government $1,500 a year for each man.

Mr. HAY. If they do become brigadiers, this precedent now set, or heretofore set, will apply to the men who are now colonels, will it not?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, no; they become brigadiers anyhow.

Mr. HAY. I do not mean this law, but I mean it will give an opportunity for those gentlemen who have served in the civil war, and who are now on the active list below the rank of brigadier-general, to come to Congress hereafter and ask to be made major-generals.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They are not in the same class with the four whom we have promoted and these five here, for the reason that the old law provided that they would have to serve at least a year as brigadier-generals and have had so long a service in the army. It can not apply to them, because they can not be brigadiers for a year; but as to the equity of the matter, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is as able to pass on that as I am.

Mr. HAY. I am just stating the proposition.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Those that are now colonels will unquestionably become brigadiers on retirement.

Mr. HAY. There are others who will be seeking the benefit of this precedent.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There are very few, but possibly some, who may claim they should have it.

Mr. HAY. Congress could not very well refuse them, could it?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is a question. There are many men on the retired list as to whom, in my judgment, it would not be any great violence to the equities and the justice of the matter if they were made major-generals on the retired list, in view of the past action of Congress. Take General Carr, of Illinois, for instance, who was a major-general of volunteers and served continuously for forty-four years. Take General Schwann, who was in the Utah expedition in 1856, a most accomplished officer. But that case is not before us, and I doubt whether it ever will get before us. This is a proposition that these men claim puts them on an equality with what we did over two years ago for four staff officers. I am glad to say that only one of these five men is a staff officer. If it ought to be done for any man, it ought to be for the man that is out fighting all the time, in place of working in an office, in the staff.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Have we now practically exhausted the material from which we can draw in order to continue following the bad precedent heretofore established?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is my information from The Adjutant-General of the Army, and I have never found him mistaken in his statements.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Every colonel on the active list who becomes a brigadier will unquestionably ask us——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, he does not become a brigadier until he is retired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. He may become a brigadier before he retires.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; because there are no vacancies. They all retire in a very short time. I think all the civil-war officers will retire within the next year or a little over that. I have not looked into that to learn the exact situation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I have not looked into that, because I am sure that none of them could be on the basis of these gentlemen; but I will say to the gentleman from Texas, with entire frankness, that if any of the civil-war men are promoted to be brigadiers and do serve a year and have had forty years' service in the army, this Congress can hardly refuse to give them the same recognition if they come before it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If they serve a year or less?

Mr. KEIFER. I should like to ask the gentleman whether this proposition involves an extension of the retired list?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It does not extend it, except that it places these men on the retired list with the rank of major-general.

Mr. KEIFER. Is the conference report an agreement upon this matter?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not at all.

Mr. KEIFER. This is outside of it?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Outside of agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. KEIFER. One question further: Is the gentleman able to state the names and the number of persons who would be eligible to be put upon the retired list in the discretion of the President if this proviso is put in the bill?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; there will be five of them—General Morton, commanding the Department of the Missouri; General Thomas, commanding the Department of the Colorado; General Marshall, the Chief of Engineers, who occupies exactly the same position on this proposition as did General Mackenzie, to whom Congress gave this; and two other men mentioned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], whose names I can not now recall.

Mr. KEIFER. This will exhaust the list?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This exhausts the list.

Mr. PARKER rose.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER. I want to ask whether the retirement of these gentlemen would not make vacancies which would be filled from the list of other colonels?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; because they could not be brigadiers for one year.

Mr. PARKER. I understand, but they might be retired right away.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; because there is no vacancy. Mr. Speaker, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, all matters in controversy between the two Houses on the army appropriation bill have been amicably settled by the conferees, and this conference report is unanimous with the exception of amendment No. 21, which the Senate incorporated in the bill. I will read that amendment for the benefit of the House:

Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, extend the proviso contained under the heading "Retired officers" in the act making appropriation for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, approved March 2, 1907, so as to include any officer who served creditably in the regular or volunteer forces of the United States during the civil war, and who is now and has been for a period of not less than one year serving as a brigadier-general on the active list of the army, and who at date of retirement will have served in the army more than forty years.

Now, sir, if this proviso should be adopted it will affect the following officers: Generals Thomas, Morton, Hodges, Brush, and Marshall, now brigadier-generals, and retire them as major-generals. I will give briefly their records in the Army of the United States.

First, Gen. Earle D. Thomas. He has been in the service, volunteer and regular, for over forty-seven and one-half years. He has been a brigadier-general for two years and ten months. He will be retired January 4, 1911, and when retired will have served forty-eight and one-half years. He is now the commander of the Department of Colorado.

The next officer is Gen. Charles Morton. He has been in the volunteer and regular service for over forty-eight years. He has been a brigadier-general two years and ten months. He will be retired on account of age March 18, 1910. When retired he will have been in the service over forty-eight years. He is now commander of the Department of Missouri.

The next officer is Gen. Charles L. Hodges. He has been in the volunteer and regular service forty-four years and two months. He has been a brigadier-general two years and nine months. He will be retired on account of age on March 13, 1911. He will have served continuously forty-five years and three months. He is now commander of the Department of Dakota.

The next officer is Gen. Daniel L. Brush. He has been in the volunteer and regular service forty-two years and nine months. He has been a brigadier-general for two years. He will be retired on account of the age limit May 9, 1912, and when retired will have served continuously over forty-five years. He is now in command of a department in the Philippines.

The next officer is Gen. William L. Marshall. He has been in the service, volunteer and regular, forty-six years and nine months. He has been a brigadier-general one year and seven months. He will be retired on account of age limit June 11, 1910, and when retired will have served continuously over forty-seven years. He is now on the General Staff and Chief of the Corps of Engineers of the Army.

Briefly, these are the records of these brave men. All of these officers did hard and glorious service during the war for the Union. Some of them afterwards went to West Point and graduated, and all of them have been in the Regular Army ever since the close of the civil war. They have been on the firing line in the Indian wars. Most of them did heroic service for years on the frontier. They went all through the Spanish-American war and did gallant service for the Government. In the opinion of the best men in the army, in the judgment of those familiar with the great services they have rendered, they should have this recognition. To do otherwise would be an unjust discrimination against them. We retired recently at one grade higher, under the act referred to in this proviso, several brigadier-generals on the staff who never performed the services that these officers have rendered for more than forty years. We should be fair and just in this matter to all, and it is believed that we would be recreant to now discriminate against these officers whose names I have mentioned. They are the last of the brigadier-generals now in the army who served gallantly during the civil war. They should be treated the same as the others that were retired as major-generals. I do not believe in making invidious distinctions. No better soldiers than these heroic men ever served in our army. They, too, should be retired, as well as their predecessors, as major-generals; and when this bill becomes a law and these officers are retired in accordance with this provision, that will forever close the doors to any more of these retirements. As I said, they are the last of the brigadier-generals who served in the civil war. Hence the Senate unanimously adopted this provision, and the conferees on the part of the Senate were unanimous in insisting upon its adoption, and I, for one, as a conferee of this House, believe that it is just, believe it is right, and I believe that we should agree to it, and give these grizzled warriors and battle-scarred veterans the rank to which they are justly entitled when retired for age.

Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a number of letters and several petitions from all over the country and from leading citizens, asking that this be done, and I shall, with the consent of the House, incorporate some of them in the RECORD as part of my speech. I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I understand that this amendment of the Senate simply puts these five remaining brigadier-generals upon the same plane and status where we have placed all the others.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. And not to do it is to discriminate against equally meritorious officers.

Mr. SULZER. Quite so. That is what I said.

The data referred to by Mr. SULZER are as follows:

NEW YORK, February 21, 1910.

Hon. WILLIAM SULZER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SULZER: The Senate has adopted an amendment to the military appropriation bill, which I understand is amendment No. 21, and which has the effect of promoting Gen. William L. Marshall to the rank and pay of major-general on retirement on June 24 next.

General Marshall has been so efficient in promoting the interests of New York Harbor when in charge of the operations of the construction of Ambrose Channel, which is now approaching completion, that I wish particularly to commend this amendment to your kind and favorable attention, and am sure that New York's gratitude to him can not be evinced in a better way than by the adoption of the amendment in question.

Yours, very truly, GUSTAV H. SCHWAB.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.
(Founded A. D. 1768.)

At the monthly meeting of the chamber of commerce, held Thursday, November 7, 1907, the following resolutions, reported by the committee of the chamber on the harbor and shipping, was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the chamber of commerce recognizes with great satisfaction the report of its committee on the harbor and shipping that one-half of the adopted plan of the United States Government for the excavation and widening of the east channel, now named the 'Ambrose Channel,' has been accomplished and perfected so that vessels of the huge dimensions of the Lusitania can enter and leave with safety.

"Resolved, That the chamber recognizes how very much this great work is due to the skill, energy, and persistence of Col. William L.

Marshall, United States engineer in charge thereof, and in view of the work still to be done in excavating the other half so that a channel of 2,000 feet will be afforded, expresses its earnest wish and desire that the same efficient officer may be retained in that work, and that the Government will considerately not permit the diversion of his time and talent to any other object until the same is completed."

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, December 24, 1907.

(Memorandum for General Duvall.)

AMBROSE CHANNEL.

Referring to memorandum of the 21st instant, the Chief of Engineers would say that he now has good reasons to expect the completion of Ambrose Channel in New York Harbor during the year 1910.

An important element of Colonel Marshall's efficiency in the prosecution of this work flows from the fact that he has been in charge of the work almost from the inception of the project and has the advantage of an intimate knowledge of all its aspects, including some which are not wholly of an engineering character.

Colonel Marshall is personally known to the maritime interests most deeply concerned in the success of the project and enjoys their unreserved confidence. He can best conserve the interests of the United States in the execution of this work, because those who are concerned in the matter and whose influence must be reckoned with will be guided by Colonel Marshall's opinion and judgment as they would not be guided by the opinion and judgment of his successor, howsoever capable.

In these important particulars candor compels the Chief of Engineers to admit that he can not replace Colonel Marshall without a temporary lowering of the efficiency and vigor of administration of the work, for this reason, and the sole reason, that he can not supply a man for the place whose familiarity with local conditions will equal that of Colonel Marshall.

In the Corps of Engineers changes of station are ordinarily accompanied by changes of duty, and it is only men who are unsatisfactory who can be replaced with advantage. Changes of station are made from considerations of policy and justice which can not be ignored, and ordinarily in spite of some sacrifice of the interests of the work.

As to whether the conditions which make for Colonel Marshall's present retirement outweigh the disadvantage to the works now in his charge and that to the Corps of Engineers which will result from such retirement the Chief of Engineers is not in position to express an opinion.

Very respectfully,

A. MACKENZIE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK,
December 17, 1907.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States, White House,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In 1899 Congress took action providing for the construction of the Ambrose Channel in the port of New York to a depth of 40 feet and a width of 2,000 feet. The creation and successful completion of the channel is, in our opinion, one of the most important pieces of work for the trade and commerce of the whole country which has ever been undertaken as a harbor improvement.

It is hardly necessary to call your attention to the fact that the vast proportion of the foreign commerce of the United States and a large proportion of the coastwise commerce of the country passes in and out of New York Harbor. You are also doubtless aware that the old ship channel, with its acute angle near the southwest spit and with its inadequate width and depth of water, continues to be a constant menace to the navigation of the larger steamships, which, because of their very size, have been able to reduce, and with the increased depth of the Ambrose Channel will be able still further to reduce, the rate of transportation upon commodities.

This improvement was authorized by Congress only after a vigorous fight, which was led by Mr. John W. Ambrose, a director and representative of this association, to whom was given the hearty cooperation of practically all the other trade and steamship organizations in and around this port.

The appropriation provided for this work was at that time considered by most experts to be entirely inadequate. There was serious doubt as to the possibility of obtaining bids which would permit the completion of the work within the appropriation, but after considerable trouble, including the rejection of the first set of bids because of the excess of cost over the amount fixed by Congress, acceptable bids were finally obtained and contracts were let. The exceedingly low contract price necessitated the most careful and vigilant supervision on the part of the Government to insure proper execution and completion of the work in accordance with the specifications. Shortly after the execution of the contracts and before the actual work of construction began Lieut. Col. W. L. Marshall, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, was assigned to the port of New York and was put in charge of the supervision of this work, and from the very beginning of the actual construction, as supervising engineer on behalf of the Government, he has been in constant touch with its progress. The execution of his duties in this capacity has been highly satisfactory to the mercantile and steamship interests in this port, who are the parties directly affected and are in a position to be cognizant of his ability.

We suggest that in this particular instance it would be eminently proper and, we believe, most beneficial to the commerce of the whole country to have Colonel Marshall retained in his present office in charge of this most important work until its ultimate completion. We therefore respectfully request that if any proposed action would result in Colonel Marshall's retirement an exception be made in his case, in order that the vast interests of this port, the commerce of the country, and the Federal Government may have the benefit of his peculiar knowledge, experience, and ability in completing the improvement.

For your information we attach hereto a copy of letter to the Secretary of War relative to this subject.

Very respectfully, yours,

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK,
By CLARENCE WHITMAN, President.

NEW YORK PRODUCE EXCHANGE,
December 19, 1907.

To Hon. WILLIAM H. TAFT,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We have been given to understand that the retiring board have under consideration the question of retiring Lieut. Col. W. L. Marshall, who has been in charge of the harbor works in New York. This gentleman, with energy and judgment, has supervised the important work of the harbor and the construction of Ambrose Channel. The members of our exchange who are conversant with his work believe it is of importance to our city and the whole country that the important work of our harbor should be carried along on the same lines and under the supervision heretofore employed until the work is completed. We therefore consider the retention of the gentleman named is most desirable, so he may be at the head of this enterprise, pushing it along for the benefit of our commercial community.

Trusting you may see your way to favorably consider this appeal to you, I am,

Respectfully, yours,

WM. HARRIS DOUGLAS,
President.

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK,
December 17, 1907.

Hon. WILLIAM H. TAFT,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Merchants' Association of New York respectfully represent that the important work of the deepening of the Ambrose Channel, leading from the harbor of New York to the sea, has been since its inception under the charge of Lieut. Col. W. L. Marshall, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, and has been continuously supervised by this officer.

The shipping and business interests of New York, and, in a wider sense, the commerce of the whole country, await the early completion of this improvement, which will result in far-reaching benefits not only to the city of New York but to the whole country in an increase rendered possible in the size of the carrier and a decrease in the rate of transportation; and will, furthermore, contribute very largely to safe navigation in the approaches of this harbor, now restricted to a narrow and difficult channel.

The Merchants' Association of New York, in view of the vast interests involved, strongly urge the retention of Lieutenant-Colonel Marshall in charge of this work until the ultimate completion of the improvement, and deprecate strongly any change in the supervision of the work in question at the present time.

Very respectfully, yours,

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK,
By CLARENCE WHITMAN, President.

THE MARITIME ASSOCIATION OF THE PORT OF NEW YORK,
New York, December 19, 1907.

Hon. WILLIAM H. TAFT,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

SIR: It is our understanding that the army retiring board has under consideration the retirement from the service of Lieut. Col. W. L. Marshall, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, who has been in charge of the harbor works of New York, including the construction of the Ambrose Channel, which, as you are of course aware, is much needed at this port to accommodate the rapidly increasing size of our modern steamships, and the congested condition of the main ship channel makes it hazardous for these giants to maneuver, and relief by the Ambrose Channel becomes imperative and at the earliest date possible.

The work carried on by Colonel Marshall in planning and supervising the construction of this channel to its present state can not be too highly commended and is heartily approved by all who are familiar with this project. His retirement at the present time, depriving the project of the knowledge and ripe experience gained by his many years of association with this great work would, to our minds, be a great detriment to its prompt and efficient completion. In view of the above, therefore, the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, comprising in its membership of nearly 1,000 the leading steamship and ship owners and agents, importers and exporters, and so forth, at this port, most earnestly and respectfully request that Colonel Marshall be retained in his present position at this port until the completion of the Ambrose Channel. It is our prayer that in view of the great importance of this work, not only to New York City but the country at large, that you will see fit to grant this most urgent request and, in consequence, confer a great favor upon this association and the commercial interests of our city and country.

We have the honor to remain,
Very respectfully, yours,

C. R. NORMAN, President.

THE MARITIME ASSOCIATION OF THE PORT OF NEW YORK,
New York, December 10, 1907.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We understand that Lieut. Col. W. L. Marshall, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, who has been in charge of harbor works at this port, including the construction of the Ambrose Channel, is about to be retired. If this be so, this last-named project, which was planned and supervised up to its present stage by Colonel Marshall, will of necessity be intrusted to his successor, who, notwithstanding whatever attainments and qualifications he may have as an engineer, will not be possessed of the experience and knowledge regarding this particular work that Colonel Marshall has secured through his long connection with it. A change, therefore, at this time would without doubt result in delays and greatly deter the completion of this important improvement.

The main ship channel to-day, owing to the enormous size of the trans-Atlantic steamers and the increased size of our coastwise steamers, is so congested that the maneuvering of these vessels is extremely hazardous.

We pray, therefore, on behalf of our association, comprising in its membership of nearly 1,000 the leading steamship and ship owners and agents at this port, that Colonel Marshall's retirement from his work at this port be deferred until such time as the Ambrose Channel can be completed and the main ship channel relieved of the crowded condition which now prevails. The benefits that will accrue to our shipping generally through the early completion of this important improvement can not be overestimated and will extend throughout our entire country.

We trust, Mr. President, that you will give this matter your prompt attention, as we understand that the Secretary of War will act upon the findings of the retiring board upon his arrival home.

I have the honor to remain,
Your obedient servant,

C. R. NORMAN, President.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, December 2, 1907.

Col. W. L. MARSHALL,
Corps of Engineers, New York City.

COLONEL: In reply to your letter of the 27th ultimo, I have the honor to furnish the information requested, as follows:

The records of the office of the Chief of Engineers show that Colonel Marshall, since 1877, has been absent on leave a total of one hundred and forty days, as per statement herewith.

The records of the office of the Chief of Engineers seem to show that during all of these leaves Colonel Marshall remained in charge of his works, supervising them, however, while absent from his regular station.

There is no record in the office of the Chief of Engineers of Colonel Marshall having been absent on account of sickness at any period of his service.

The conditions of Colonel Marshall's service have been quite intimately known to the present Chief of Engineers during almost his entire service in the army, and the reputation in which he is held by this office is that of relieving his superiors of responsibility for details in all cases which come within his province to decide, his actions, however, at all times being governed by the fullest subordination to superior authority. He possesses the qualifications, in addition to great ability as an engineer, of a good soldier.

Very respectfully,

A. MACKENZIE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

COPY OF INDORSEMENT ON APPLICATION MADE BY COL. W. L. MARSHALL, CORPS OF ENGINEERS, FOR RELIEF FROM THE TEST OF SKILL AND ENDURANCE IN HORSEMANSHIP.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE EAST,
Governors Island, New York, October 5, 1907.

Respectfully forwarded to The Adjutant-General of the Army.

Colonel Marshall has been physically examined, and no reason for his not undergoing the test for horsemanship has been found other than that herein stated by him.

This is, in my opinion, sufficient to justify him being excused from the test, and I have accordingly excused him.

Colonel Marshall has been and is an exceptionally efficient officer. I know of no engineer officers of superior ability and few of equal.

It is highly improbable that he will be assigned to mounted duty during his remaining two years and eight months of service on the active list.

For the above reasons, I recommend that no further action, because of his not undergoing the test of horsemanship, be taken in his case.

F. D. GRANT,
Major-General, United States Army, Commanding.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
New York City, March 24, 1908.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
United States Army, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The Chief of Engineers will be retired for age May 25, 1908.

If, preparatory to filling the vacancy thus caused, the President should consider the records of any engineer officers of rank junior to that of my seniors in the Corps of Engineers, I have the honor to request and recommend that he consider the record of Col. W. L. Marshall, who, in my opinion, is of all engineer officers best entitled to promotion to Chief of Engineers by reason of his exceptional talents, his use of these for the best interests of the Government, his application to duty, and his integrity.

He does not retire for age until June 11, 1910.

Very respectfully,

JOHN G. D. KNIGHT,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers.

NEW YORK, November 6, 1907.

To the honorable THE SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: The undersigned, controlling and representing steamships employed in the transportation of hundreds of thousands of lives and of many millions in value of cargo, and interested in insurance on cargo and on vessels, respectfully represent—

That the improvements in the approaches to the harbor of New York, now under way, which will render this harbor one of the safest and finest in the world, were begun and have been most efficiently prosecuted under the direction of Lieut. Col. W. L. Marshall, Corps of Engineers, United States Army;

That the interests represented by the undersigned require the continued supervision by Colonel Marshall of this important improvement until its final completion, to the end that the work, which calls for constant careful attention and which demands the accumulated knowledge and experience of years, may be carried through at an early date and on the same lines as heretofore pursued.

The undersigned, therefore, respectfully urge the retention in his present position of Lieutenant-Colonel Marshall until the Ambrose Channel improvement to its entire extent shall have been finished, and beg leave to remain,

Your very obedient servants,

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield for a question.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman inform me what disposition has been made of amendment No. 30, which provides—

That the Secretary of War is authorized, under requisition of the governor of a State or Territory, or the commanding general of the militia of the District of Columbia, to pay to the quartermaster-general, or such other officer of the militia as may be duly designated and appointed for the purpose, so much of the allotment under the annual appropriation authorized by section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended, as shall be necessary for the payment of subsistence, transportation, and other expenses of such portion of the organized militia as may be engaged in encampments, etc.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, as to that amendment, the Senate receded, and that has gone out of the bill by reason of the adoption of the conference report. I think, as there has been such an immense number of telegrams showered upon Congress, it is only fair for me to extend my answer to the gentleman enough to say that section 1661 of the Revised Statutes is the one that provides for arms, ammunition, clothing, camp and garrison equipage of the militia of the several States. It is a specific and annual appropriation that goes on from year to year for the maintenance of the militia. Congress some years ago adopted as part of the law a provision that the maneuvers should be provided for in a separate item, and the money paid out for maneuvers to the milita must be appropriated by Congress. This year we gave to the milita every dollar asked for for maneuvers. We increased it $350,000 more than ever was appropriated in any one year before by Congress.

Now, this proposition comes up, and proposes to let the governors of the States, backed by their adjutants-general, take out of the permanent appropriation for arms, ammunition, clothing, and camp and garrison equipage whatever they may desire of that four millions and divert it to the maneuvers from year to year when authorized by Congress. The committee of the House and of the Senate had no difference of opinion when we discussed it that such a proposition was bad legislation, and that no state officer should ever have the power to divert funds provided by Congress for a specific purpose to any other purpose than that for which the Congress appropriated that money. So, on a full discussion there was no difference of opinion between the two Houses, and the Senate receded.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] a question or two. How many more officers are there in the army that served during the civil war?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I could not answer that because I did not take any pains to look it up, but I think not a very large number.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Nearly all get some kind of promotion before they get out?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. My understanding is that Charles Morton's place is already filled by an officer, a colonel, who has been selected, and that he does not come under the clause provided for here at all, and could not. There will be no other vacancies at all, in my judgment, until the civil-war men are all retired. All civil-war men of a lower grade will have been retired, and it is impossible for them to have served the year that is required here. So I assume that the department is correct in saying that these five close up this line of legislation; at least, that is, all that are on all fours with what we have done before.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it the settled policy to keep up this process of retiring officers in the army at the age of 64, or is there any possibility of repealing that?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is the law, and I think there is no possibility of repealing it. I will say to the gentleman that a great many officers at 64 are just as competent as at any other period of their lives.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is what I think myself.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Some of them are more competent than younger men; but you stop the flow of promotion entirely when you do away with the age limit.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What difference does that make?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It makes a great difference. They come here and get relief on what they call their "humps," as you gave them to the navy, by providing for compulsory retirement if they do not reach a certain grade before attaining a certain age.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many are on the retired list?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I should say several hundred.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There are enough to make a regiment, are there not?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not so many as that; but they would make a very good battalion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why does not the Government take these retired officers and put them to drilling boys throughout the country?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Because those in charge of the boys do not want them. There is no school in the United States that will take a retired officer as an original proposition if they can possibly avoid it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the War Department had sense enough to refuse to furnish them officers on the active list, they would be glad to get these retired officers, would they not?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They have some. They have one retired officer, I think, in Illinois, who is very satisfactory.

Mr. MANN. He was not retired for age.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The schools want a younger man and a more active man than a man over 64 years of age.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Nobody cares what the schools want. The business of a Congressman is to do the best he can for the country, and I am in favor of having a thoroughly drilled militia in the United States of a million men, so that if we ever have another war we will have an army, and these retired officers might as well be drilling these boys as sitting around and sucking their thumbs.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There is a bill before the House relative to rifle practice containing similar features, and the gentleman will probably have an opportunity to vote on that later.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In reference to the inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], that an active, healthy, able-bodied, clear-headed officer should not be retired because he has reached the age of 64, I want to say that, so far as there is any probability of the repeal of that law, the great influence of the administration is now being exercised and pressure is being brought to bear upon the Congress to even go further to accelerate promotions, to establish elimination by which many officers, and efficient men, I believe, too, will be put out of the army for the purpose of securing a more rapid flow of promotion. I believe, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] evidently believes, that retired officers, regardless of the wishes of the superintendents of these schools, should be put to work in the schools. I know from personal letters I have received——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not like to yield out of this hour for a discussion on something that is not before us at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. All right, Mr. Speaker; I have said all I want to say.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-two minutes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, it is a grief to me not to be able to vote to recede and concur in the Senate amendment, because I know some of these gentlemen, and I love them and admire them as officers and for themselves. But so far from being a discrimination against them if this amendment be rejected, it is a discrimination in favor of them if the amendment be accepted. There are hundreds of gallant officers upon the retired list, not only brigadier-generals, but majors and colonels, and there are thousands of others who served throughout the war who are on no retired list whatever, and all are equally entitled to our kindness. They include men who have given as long and gallant years of good service before, in, and after the war. Because these five officers have had the good fortune and favor before they were 64 to be chosen as brigadier-generals, and to serve and be paid one year as such, is no reason that we should further promote them as major-generals over colonels who were alongside them in the war, and did perhaps just as good service. [Loud applause.] Now, I have said all that I have to say. It is a grief to vote against any good friend and officer in the army, and against giving him any rank that is possible; but special bills for the giving of rank should be discouraged by this House, not only because they are always unfair, but because such bills destroy the spirit of any army. [Loud applause.] Any army of officers that feel they can get rank by favor of Congress is no longer an army of officers.

I can not approve this special bill or provision to confer special rank. I can not vote for it.

Mr. SULZER. I ask the gentleman from New Jersey if he did not vote for a similar bill—the act of March, 1907?

Mr. PARKER. I did.

Mr. SULZER. Then, why does the gentleman vote against an identical provision in this bill?

Mr. PARKER. Because I repented the moment I had voted for that act. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the enactment of this clause of this bill will operate as a great injustice against the men who are in the ranks of the army; men who are in line for promotion—who should be promoted on merit. This will prohibit them from getting the promotion to which they are entitled by reason of their service, because it fills the places to which they ought to be promoted. To promote a man and pay him more when retired than when on the active list is an injustice to the other officers of the army. It seems to me there ought not to be two ideas in this House as to what should be done with this proposition. The conferees should be sent back with instructions to insist upon the position of the House, and to insist upon the elimination of this amendment which was placed in the bill by the Senate.

Mr. SULZER. I assume from the gentleman's argument that he is opposed to rewarding merit?

Mr. MADDEN. I am opposed to rewarding anybody as a matter of favor. If any man has performed distinguished service for his country and is deserving of reward because of that distinguished service, I will be one of the first men on this floor to vote to reward him.

Mr. SULZER. Then the gentleman will vote for this amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I am opposed to rewarding men merely because they think they have influence. Let them stand upon their own merits. Let them secure their promotion in accordance with the rules of the army; let Congress keep its hands off all questions of this kind, and give every man who has the honor to serve as an officer in the army equal opportunity for promotion. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Just one correction of the gentleman's remarks, where he says this gives the men more on the retired list than when on the active list. That is not quite correct.

Mr. MADDEN. How near to it?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It would be the same pay proper, but the allowances are not given any longer, and that amounts to several hundred dollars.

I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I think there is some misapprehension on the part of some gentlemen who have recently spoken on this amendment as to the retirement provision of this bill. The amendment provides for officers going upon the retired list, and does not undertake to make up an army of officers for active service at all. These men are to be promoted and retired, and the proposed proviso applies simply to a few officers and gives them the right to be retired with the honor of the increased rank and with the increased retired pay, if you please. The latter is a very important part to a man who has served all his life in the army, who has a wife and family to provide for, an officer who is getting old and frail and feeble, and with a family dependent upon him, who has not accumulated anything during that period, even though he has lived with great economy all his life.

It is not a question of preference, because to retire officers with an increased rank will make way for somebody else to come up to the rank which the retired officer formerly held. So it is not unjust to those who remain on the active list in the army.

Having said that much, I feel it to be my duty to vote for this provision, not because I think it works out equitably and justly all around in the matter of retiring officers of the army, for there are very many officers on the retired list who are just as worthy by reason of active field service during the civil war as the men who will be promoted if this provision becomes a law; but as we all know it is impossible to work out justice in every case.

There are men on the active list in the army now who served long in the civil war and with credit. If they were not officers in all cases they still served with distinguished credit. I know a man in the United States Army now who ought to be a brigadier-general, and should have been long ago, who served in the civil war when almost a child. He was in the battle of Chickamauga, and other battles in 1863, when 12 years of age. He was small for his age then. He served to the end of the war without having any chance to get a good education. He afterwards aspired to go to West Point, and I will tell you how he went through that institution. He solicited, shortly after the civil war, of General Grant, when President of the United States, an appointment as a cadet at West Point. President Grant promised it to him as soon as he was old enough and felt ready to take the required examination. When later he notified President Grant that he was ready to try to get into the Military Academy as a cadet, General Grant nominated him as a cadet as he had promised. This young man started from his western home and went to West Point, where he underwent the examination, physical and mental, and the old board up there passed upon it and rejected him on every known ground. He was too short, he did not weigh enough, and he failed in mathematics and literature, and in everything else. On his way homeward he came to this city, called on President Grant, and succeeded in getting into the cabinet room, found Grant there alone, thanked him for the opportunity that had been given him to get into the United States Army as an officer, and told the President that he had been unfortunate and had failed in his examination and must go home and resume some other occupation than that of a soldier. Grant, in an assumed, cold, stern way, told this ambitious young man and soldier that he was glad he had failed in his examination. That was not very consoling to a broken-hearted, ambitious, patriotic soldier boy; but before he left, Grant wrote a little card and put it in an envelope and asked this young man to take it over to the War Department to the Secretary of War. He carried it over as requested, and he said as soon as he handed the envelope to the Secretary, the Secretary was very polite to him, asked him to take a seat, paid him great respect, and immediately made out an appointment for him as a second lieutenant in the army of the United States. He is to-day the senior colonel in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army—John L. Clem. [Applause.] He has served all along the line with distinction; chief quartermaster at Porto Rico, chief quartermaster for a number of years in the Philippines. He has been a military instructor at a great university. He acquired an education and became an accomplished officer. I saw him last when he was chief quartermaster on the Pacific slope, and he is now serving in the line of his duty with great distinction. He might be retired as a brigadier-general or a major-general and do credit to this country; but we can not do justice to all the deserving officers and soldiers of the great civil war and all along the line. According to my habit and the precedent of my past votes, I shall be obliged to vote for this amendment, notwithstanding it works out inequality in particular cases.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from New York if he desires to move to recede and concur?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and concur in the same, which motion takes precedence.

The question was taken, and on a division [demanded by Mr. SULZER] there were—ayes 52, noes 43.

Mr. MANN and Mr. MADDEN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Speaker appointed Mr. MANN and Mr. SULZER.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 70.

Mr. SULZER. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were refused, not a sufficient number seconding the demand.

Accordingly the motion to recede and concur was rejected.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I move that the House insist on its disagreement and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House, Mr. HULL of Iowa, Mr. PRINCE, and Mr. SULZER.

PENSIONS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that bills on the Private Calendar in order to-day may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that bills on the Private Calendar in order to-day may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WILLIAM KEYES.

The first bill on the calendar was the bill (S. 4672) to correct the military record of William Keyes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion now standing on the records of the War Department against the name of William Keyes, late private in Company B, One hundred and forty-second Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and to grant him an honorable discharge from said organization: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That in the administration of the pension laws William Keyes shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company B, One hundred and forty-second Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, on the 30th day of October, 1864: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act."

Elliott shall be held and considered to have been mustered into the service of the United States on September 15, 1864, as of Company E, Seventh Regiment Tennessee Mounted Infantry Volunteers, and to have been honorably discharged from said service on January 25, 1865, and that the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to place his name on the rolls of said organization and to grant him an honorable discharge therefrom.

The following committee amendment was read:

Add at the end of the bill the following:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

JAMES M'KENZIE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3348) for the relief of James McKenzie.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That James McKenzie be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from Company D, First Battalion, Eleventh United States Infantry, as of date of August 26, 1865: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, James McKenzie, now a resident of Iowa, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company D, First Battalion, Eleventh Regiment United States Infantry, on the 26th day of August, 1865: Provided, That no pension shal accrue prior to the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

DANIEL H. WIGGIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16824) for the relief of Daniel H. Wiggin.

Be it enacted, etc., That Daniel H. Wiggin shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as private of Company B, Third Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, on the 23d day of August, 1864: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Daniel H. Wiggin, now a resident of New Hampshire, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company B, Third Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, on the 1st day of August, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. FLACK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 17838) for the relief of George W. Flack.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws George W. Flack shall be deemed and taken to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company I, Fifth Regiment United States Veteran Volunteers, on the 13th day of June, A. D. 1866.

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, George W. Flack, now a resident of Pennsylvania, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company I, Fifth Regiment United States Veteran Volunteer Infantry, on the 16th day of June, 1866: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that this bill can not be considered to-day for the purpose of getting a ruling upon this class of bills. The rules provide:

The second and fourth Friday in each month, after disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, shall be set apart for the consideration of private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills to remove charges of desertion.

This bill is a bill providing that in the administration of the pension laws George W. Flack shall be deemed and taken to have been honorably discharged from the military service. Of course, it is in order to-day only on one of two grounds—either that this bill removes the charge of desertion, or it is a bill granting a pension.

The Committee on Military Affairs, I notice, has adopted this form of bill in preference to the form of bill that used generally to be used directly removing the charge of desertion.

Personally, I think the present form is much superior to the old form. Of course if this bill is in order to-day it would not be in order on the day that claims or war claims are in order. If it is not in order to-day it would be in order on those days. I raise the question solely for the purpose of having a ruling, in order that the House and Clerk may know what day these bills shall be considered. Plainly, they are in order on one of the Fridays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to hold that this bill and amendment would substantially be entitled to consideration to-day as a pension bill. It provides—

That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the Soldiers' Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, George W. Flack, now a resident of Pennsylvania, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company I, Fifth Regiment U. S. Veteran Volunteer Infantry, on the 16th day of June, 1866: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Now, that does not change the record. The greater includes the less, and the effect, in the opinion of the Chair, of this bill, if enacted into law, would be to give the soldier a pensionable status under the general law. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 5702) to supplement an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ELKINS, Mr. CRANE, and Mr. TAYLOR as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PATRICK SHIELDS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 20180) for the relief of Patrick Shields.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Patrick Shields, now a resident of New York, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a first sergeant of Company B, Sixty-second Regiment New York Veteran Volunteer Infantry, on the 5th day of January, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

With the following amendment:

Line 10, strike out the word "fifth" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fourteenth."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL WAR PENSIONS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 21108), granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws—

The name of William H. Wright, late of Company I, One hundred and eighty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of William Guy, late of Company A, Second Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of James L. Mayers, late of Company E, Sixth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Jane K. Hall, widow of James Hall, late of Company B, Thirty-ninth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The name of William B. Britton, late major Eighth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of William H. Edie, late of Company L, First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Allen Patrick, late of Company C, One hundred and ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Robert Carlton, late of U. S. S. Conestoga and Black Hawk, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Edwin Cowell, late of Company M, First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Rachel Turner, widow of John L. Turner, late of Company I, One hundred and twenty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving: Provided, That in the event of the death of Freddie Turner, helpless and dependent son of said John L. WILLIAM H. HAWLEY, DECEASED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 21693) to correct the military record of William H. Hawley, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws William H. Hawley, alias Henry Hawley, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as private in Company E, Twenty-first Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, on the 6th day of April, 1863: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21419, the post-office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21419, the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to use some of his time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, in the post-office appropriation bill, now under consideration, an effort has been made, as in all the fiscal and appropriation bills already presented here, to effect the economy so earnestly requested by the President. But, with all due respect to the President and the appropriation committees, the Post-Office Department is the one place, in my judgment, where economy is misplaced. The one department producing revenue of almost sufficient volume to maintain itself should receive encouragement, and not be subjected to the strong hand at a time of stringency in revenues.

Not only is this department practically self-supporting, but it is of such extreme usefulness to the people in every way, its functions have grown to be such an inseparable part of every-day life, that economy in this question is altogether out of place, when it can be effected in so many other departments of not such equal usefulness and importance.

The cry for economy in this particular department is excused at present, on the ground that there is a large deficit in the postal revenues, amounting to $17,000,000, not enough to build two modern battle ships. It has come to be such an expected thing in the post-office for it to maintain itself and not look for financial help, that a deficit is looked upon as a defect, to be punished by enforcing economy. Thus, from all points of view, this useful branch of the Government is being attacked, instead of praised and helped.

An analysis of the situation seems to show that the present deficit in postal revenues is due largely to the rapid extension of the rural free-delivery system and to the low rates on second-class mail. If economies are to be effected, it would seem that these are the items which need attention. While not admitting that the Post-Office Department needs compression of appropriations, yet I am willing that these items should be so amended as to enable it to catch up with the decreased revenues, if that is deemed necessary.

Mr. FORNES. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. GOULDEN. Certainly.

Mr. FORNES. Is not the large deficit on account of the large expenditures in the rural delivery, which show, I believe, a loss of $34,000,000?

Mr. GOULDEN. It is.

Mr. FORNES. And then the second-class mail, which shows a loss of $63,000,000. Is it not a fact that since the establishment of the second-class rate the magazines and the papers have largely increased their advertising in place of its devotion to literature as was intended when the rate was made?

Mr. GOULDEN. No doubt about that, so far as the second part of your question is concerned. The second-class matter is responsible, more than any other cause, for the present deficit, and in my judgment there will be some remedy necessary in order to correct it. It is well settled that the large magazines and periodicals now have space taken up by advertising that runs up as high as $2,000 a page per issue, and they are regarded in my own city as one of the best-paying activities in which men can engage.

As to the rural free delivery, I am heartily in favor of that, because I believe it has been one of the best things introduced into the postal service, and benefits more people than any other item in this bill. However, I believe that the rapid extension of the system, perhaps, has grown faster than intended originally when this magnificent service was placed in the law giving to the people generally rural free delivery. I have heard some questions in regard to the rural free-delivery carriers, and while I voted for the increase a few years ago, I still do not believe that they are overpaid. I have in mind two carriers, tenants of mine, one who owns a farm of 100-odd acres, and he devotes the afternoons of each day to the cultivation of that farm. Another who has a plot of ground, and gives his afternoons to the cultivation of that. So that they are different from the carriers in the cities. Their expenses, so far as living are concerned, are lighter, and they have opportunities of doing something that will enable them to add to their incomes, which the city carriers have not.

All students of the subject admit that the extension of the second-class mailing privilege has been so enormous as to stagger the ideas of the original promoters; it has made possible the present widespread publication of newspapers and magazines, and of the periodical literature of which, in most cases, we are so justly proud. It has given our people the opportunity to show what a real freedom of the press means; it has enabled the people to be educated in every possible way that printed matter can achieve. As a good friend of mine has stated, this second-class mail privilege has been the means by which Congress has spread education and enlightenment among the people, as provided for in the Constitution.

At the same time, many of the periodicals, especially the larger and more cultured of the magazines, have not had an altogether educational or philanthropic intention in their motives of publication; they have been, and are, inspired more by business ends than otherwise. Even the latest race of "reform" magazines, those whose purpose, according to themselves, is to show Congress how it should behave, to teach Senators and Representatives how they should legislate, to show the Government how it should govern—even these keepers of our consciences are not averse to the cent-a-pound rate for mailing, and not opposed to accepting from $200 to $500 a page for advertisements each month.

Such publications, run on strictly business lines, and paying handsome profits to their owners and editors, are well able to pay a higher rate of mailing than a cent a pound. Even if not obliged to pay the usual rate for printed matter, or third-class rates, at least some increase in the rate should be made. I do not believe it would hurt the American people any, and yet it would correct some of the deficiencies of revenue.

The rural free-delivery system has also grown beyond all original bounds and estimates. In the comparatively few years it has been in existence it has grown into a gigantic system, and is now responsible for some $28,000,000 of a yearly deficit. While not opposed to the system, because of the great good it has been to the farmers and the rural communities, yet I believe that too much money is being expended on it at present; and it seems a cruel hardship to the cities of the first and second class, which produce the profits of the department, to have them expended in rural districts in an almost charitable fashion.

As a farmer myself I am in thorough sympathy with all projects for the so-called "uplift" of rural communities and farms, but if such sums of money are to be expended, it would seem to me that they should come from the General Treasury, and be directly expended on agricultural education, as contemplated in several bills now pending before this House, rather than that the money should come from post-office profits and be expended on a post system that only indirectly helps the farmers.

The worst feature of the whole matter is that the deficit produced in these two items alone, second-class rates and rural free delivery, has to be made up from the profits of the large cities and post-offices; it looks like an unjust perversion of funds to divert these profits from the cities which produce them into the rural communities which give no adequate return, and which do not show much disposition to help themselves.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true that the second-class mail that causes this deficit goes out from these large cities?

Mr. GOULDEN. True; but that is no justification of the other claim which I have just referred to, and I am sorry that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, for all of whose members I have the greatest admiration and in whom I have great confidence, did not take up the matter more seriously and do something to remedy the evil in that direction.

And now, adding insult almost to injury, not only are the cities and large offices to be deprived of their revenues, but when the cry for economy goes forth these same cities are told that they must submit to reduced allowances for salaries and expenses out of their own earnings.

The Postmaster-General has stated that the natural increase of the business requires the services of some 2,000 additional clerks each year; and if the department is to be kept up to its proper efficiency and the normal producing capacity maintained, these additional clerks should be provided for. But for the year beginning July 1 next only some 47 new clerks are provided for in the bill now under consideration. This is a shortsighted policy, for if a sufficient working force is not provided, the usual capacity of the department will be crippled and a larger deficit may be looked for in the next fiscal year.

The committee should by all means make allowance for at least 1,500 extra clerks in the bill H. R. 21419 (1,750 extra was the exact number requested by the Postmaster-General in the estimates of the department for 1911). Their employment will amply justify itself in the increased efficiency of the entire service.

Another matter which needs attention is an increase in the appropriation for salaries to clerks, permitting a larger number to be placed in the $1,200 class. Only half the number eligible for this class received the compensation last year because of the small appropriation; yet every man eligible should receive this $1,200 salary. The present bill will increase the $1,200 men from 7,000 to over 10,000, the number requested by the Postmaster-General, but as the number of supervisory officials has not been increased, a large number of such men will have to be carried in the $1,200 class, thus shutting out a corresponding number of men from their $1,200 salary.

The clerks in the larger cities are especially entitled to this consideration. In the first place, as their working hours are not fixed by law, they are obliged to work from ten to twelve and even fifteen hours a day; the day of the letter carrier is limited by law to eight hours; other employees of the Government have their time regulated by law, but the postal clerks, as hard a worked body of men as exists in the government service, are obliged to work any old number of hours they may be ordered. That they do it willingly is a magnificent tribute to their loyalty, and they should be properly rewarded. [Applause.]

The bill of my friend from Illinois [Mr. WILSON] now pending, as it has been for several sessions, should be taken up and receive the favorable action of Congress, fixing the working hours of postal clerks at eight per day for six days a week; any overtime to be paid for. It should also be remembered that most of the work of these clerks is done at night, which makes their places particularly harsh and disagreeable; and in thus giving up the time usually allotted to other men for home life and recreation they should be rewarded by at least having their working time fixed at eight hours a day for six days a week. This, with their compensation fixed at $1,200 whenever eligible, would make these men happy and contented, and the Government would reap the benefit in a better and more highly efficient service.

The $1,200 salary rate for carriers should also be given to them as soon as they have been long enough in the service to qualify; it should not be dependent upon favor or recommendation or any other consideration whatsoever; it should be given them for length of service and good behavior only, and not taken away by any local authority, subjecting them to the personal whims or peculiarities or dislikes of small officials or politicians.

In view of the increased cost of living, which is no joke to men with incomes of only $1,200, nothing but a very serious matter should deprive them of this salary. With families to support, and at least a decent show made at living, the cost of living, in our larger cities especially, makes it impossible for the men to get along properly on less than $1,200; and if the government service is to be properly maintained, the men must be decently paid. Therefore the whole service of carriers and clerks should be put on a $1,200 basis, or higher, at the earliest possible moment, and the men will be made strong, loyal civil officials and willing employees of a considerate Government. [Applause.] In addition, a retirement fund should be speedily enacted into law for both clerks and carriers.

The increased cost in the appropriations for this $1,200 salary to all eligible clerks and carriers would not be enough to hurt anybody; even if it does produce a deficit in the postal revenues, it will be produced in a worthy cause. Decent pay for these men is surely as good a cause for a postal deficit as cent-a-pound mail to rich and prosperous periodicals, or free delivery to rural communities; and, with all respect to the literary and farmer folk, I believe the carriers and clerks come first, as they actually help us to produce postal revenues, and not merely help to spend them.

And even if we do not make an effort to supply the deficiency by increasing the second-class rates or by cutting off some of the free-delivery routes, it would be well to make additional appropriations for the $1,200 clerks and carriers; it is no crime for the Post-Office Department to be additionally short that amount, or for a total deficit of $30,000,000 or $35,000,000. If other departments can expend hundreds of millions without a cent of direct return, why can not the Post-Office Department be indulged to a little extent? If there is to be economy, let it commence elsewhere than in a department doing its single-handed share to support itself.

I would like to make part of my remarks a letter from the Postmaster-General concerning a falling off in the fines imposed on railroads for late deliveries and other reasons. In the fiscal years 1907 and 1908 the net fines collected were some two-thirds of a million dollars; in 1909 and 1910 the net fines have shrunk to very small proportions, explained by the Postmaster-General as being due to the lack of such laws as compelled the railroads to live up to their time-tables and schedules. This law should be rigidly enforced. If this was done, it would materially help reduce the deficit.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 7, 1910.

Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: In compliance with your telegraphic request of the 4th instant that you be furnished with a detailed statement of fines imposed upon railroads for delinquencies, and what were collected and what remitted, with causes, during the past ten years, I have the honor to submit the following statement, which shows the gross amounts of deductions and fines, amounts of remissions, and the net amounts of such fines and deductions, for the fiscal years ended June 30, from 1900 to 1909, inclusive, and for the first half of the present fiscal year, July 1 to December 31, 1909, inclusive, on account of failures of service, late operation of mail trains, and other delinquencies, which covers all deductions, fines, and remissions ordered in the railroad service during that time:

Fiscal year.	Deductions and fines.	Remissions.	Net deductions and fines.
1900	$138,564.50	$3,093.35	$135,471.15

The heavy deductions made during the fiscal years ended June 30, 1907, 1908, and 1909, were largely due to the enforcement of the provision of the acts of Congress of June 26, 1906, and March 2, 1907, making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal years ended June 30, 1907, and June 30, 1908, respectively, that the Postmaster-General should require all railroads carrying the mails to maintain their regular train schedules as to the time of arrival and departure of said mails, and to impose and collect reasonable fines for delay when such delay was not caused by unavoidable accidents or conditions. This provision has not since been incorporated in the law.

Yours, very truly,

F. H. HITCHCOCK, Postmaster-General.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman state how it would reduce the deficit to have a more expeditious train service?

Mr. GOULDEN. If you enforce the fines and collect them as you did, three-quarters of a million dollars or more a year—and if properly enforced I have no doubt it ought to be $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 a year—it will reduce the deficit that much. The Postmaster-General in his letter says:

For the first half of the present fiscal year, July 1 to December 31, 1909, inclusive, on account of failure of service, late operations of mail trains, and other delinquencies, which covers all deductions, fines, and remissions ordered in the railroad service during that time.

After giving the amounts, he says:

The heavy deductions made during the fiscal years ended June 30, 1907, 1908, and 1909, were largely due to the enforcement of the provision of the acts of Congress of June 28, 1906, and March 2, 1907, that the Postmaster-General should require all railroads carrying the mails to maintain their regular train schedules as to the time of arrival and departure of said mails, and to impose and collect reasonable fines for such delay when such delay was not caused by unavoidable accidents or conditions. This provision has not since been incorporated in the law.

I should like to ask the chairman of the committee why has not that provision been in the law since 1908?

Mr. WEEKS. I presume the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] might answer that more definitely than I; but my understanding is that the department recommended that it be not continued in the last year's appropriation bill.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does not the gentleman think that if the law produced large fines, amounting to upward of a million dollars, it ought to be continued? Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] answer that question?

Mr. LLOYD. The Assistant Postmaster-General, who was before the committee last year when this subject was discussed, took the position that as a rule the trains were unavoidably delayed and it was no fault of the train service that the trains did not fill out their schedules; that the railways were just as anxious to have their schedules complied with as the Post-Office Department was, and that as a rule the delay was not properly chargeable to the railway service, and that it would be a hardship on the railroads to charge against them any fine on account of the delay.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does not the gentleman think, however, that in many cases if the trains were made up with a respectable number of cars they would be able to get the mails through in time, and that frequently even the best roads in the country haul such immense trains that it is impossible to make the time?

Mr. LLOYD. I hardly think there are any trains now with any fixed schedules that can not comply with the schedule under ordinary conditions. Even the fastest trains between New York and Chicago can comply with the schedule time if normal conditions prevail.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Do I understand that the gentleman is opposed to the extension of the rural free-delivery system?

Mr. GOULDEN. No; I am not opposed to it, providing we go at it in a conservative manner and do not extend the rural free-delivery service to such an extent that instead of a deficit of $28,000,000 it may be $40,000,000 or $50,000,000. I believe the system to be a good one, but I do not want to see it extended quite so rapidly, at the expense of the first and second class city clerks and carriers.

Mr. O'CONNELL. I think the gentleman is quite right. Without wishing to be considered hostile to the rural free-delivery system, I, too, believe that the efforts of this House ought to be directed to the inequalities, handicaps, and disadvantages under which our carriers, clerks, and railway mail clerks have been and are now obliged to work, rather than to increase appropriations for the development of new branches of the service. The railway mail clerks have been patient and long sufferers at the hands of this Government on the utterly far-fetched and strained argument of economy, and this House should not plead economy to deprive them of their just merit of due, while at the same moment vast sums are spent on new ideas not nearly so worthy of our attention. [Applause.]

Mr. FORNES. I wish to correct the amount that I obtained in the committee report. They stated in the report, for rural carriers, $37,645,000. I inferred there was a saving on total cost of about 10 per cent, and that is the way I reached the amount of $34,000,000. I am told now that there is a saving of at least 20 per cent on total outlay, which would leave a net loss of $28,000,000.

In discussing remedies for the deficit, why not put back the laws compelling the railroads to deliver their mails promptly, and thus get back part of the money they receive for carrying the mails, which is regarded by many as excessive? This would give some $600,000 or more a year extra, just enough to enable the department to increase the salaries of 3,000 clerks and carriers from $1,000 to $1,200, without extra appropriations and without making further deficit. I offer this as a suggestion, showing just what might be done, and I hope it will be taken under consideration by the committee and so arranged that the present bill will take care of the matter.

I have frequently heard it claimed on the floor of this House that the amounts paid the railroads for carrying the mail were too high, and that the weights were padded during the limited period required to weigh the mails. Be that as it may, I have no doubt that considerable sums could be saved if proper measures were adopted. I hope that the committee will take up these various suggestions, not made in a captious spirit, but for the benefit of the department, and investigate them thoroughly, to the end that justice may be done a most deserving class of hard-working people. [Applause.]

Consequently the gentleman from New York will excuse me for having misled him by stating that it was thirty-four millions. Now, will the gentleman indulge me still further?

Mr. GOULDEN. Certainly.

Mr. FORNES. In this actual loss of 80 per cent in carrying out the work of the rural delivery, I believe the loss is well repaid from the very fact that the Post-Office Department is doing one of its best works in that direction.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Will the gentleman from New York yield for a question?

Mr. GOULDEN. Certainly.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Does not the gentleman think that the carriers and clerks and railway mail ought to be better attended to before there is any more extension of rural free delivery?

Mr. GOULDEN. Before there is much extension of the rural free delivery I want to see the people who produce the revenue taken care of in a proper way. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have frequently heard it claimed on the floor of the House that the amount paid the railroads for carrying the mails is too high and that it is padded. That rumor has gone around the House; I have heard it in speech, in prose, in poetry for four or five years, and I should be glad if the chairman of the committee could enlighten us on this subject.

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman from New York can furnish the committee any evidence whatever on that subject to substantiate the remarks he is repeating the committee would be greatly obliged to him.

Mr. GOULDEN. I think the gentleman is aware of the rumor, and that he has heard statements made on the floor by Members of Congress in good standing, as they all are.

For, after all, Mr. Chairman, the post-office appropriation bill is one in which every Member of Congress, in fact, the whole country, is interested; and I know of no bill, I know of no issue of the RECORD that is more carefully read than that dealing with the bill now under consideration, and I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the Post-Office Committee has given careful attention to all the details; but they, like others, are not infallible, and may have made mistakes. I trust therefore in the future a deserving class of men for whom I am speaking to-day, namely, the carriers and clerks in the first and second class cities, may receive their just dues. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, it was indeed a beautiful sight yesterday afternoon to see the patriotic band of stalwart "regulars" hanging upon the lips of the eloquent speech of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts. It was a more beautiful sight to behold the distinguished Speaker of the House melting at the pathos, chuckling at the wit, and held absolutely entranced and captivated by the eloquence and logic of the same distinguished gentleman, the illustrious insurgent from the State of Massachusetts, the Hon. AUGUSTUS PEABODY GARDNER. [Laughter.]

Let us hope that this presages the dawn of a happier and brighter day for the reign of peace on that side of the Chamber. I trust that I shall not say one word to mar even the beginning of the loving harmony which will hereafter prevail over there. [Laughter.]

The membership of the House is to be commended for the good nature and courtesy that have marked its discussions during this session. I hope I shall not disturb the amenities of debate; but, of course, my friends of the majority, you appreciate how difficult it is for one to discuss with the whole truth your record and at the same time be entirely parliamentary. [Laughter.] The older we grow the more softened becomes our partisan feeling. I reckon I used to have as much of it as anybody, but since my service here I have met so many good Republicans that I have long ago reached the conclusion that a Republican is never dangerous to a Democrat except in elections and is never harmful to the public except in office. [Laughter.]

I have said during this session that there is not a Republican in this House that had the nerve to defend boldly and openly upon this floor the Aldrich-Payne Act, but when I heard that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] was going to make a speech, I said to my comrades here, "There is one man, an insurgent at that, the regulars are going to 'gold brick' into undertaking the hopeless task." Imagine my disappointment when out of the hour and ten minutes speech on the tariff and high prices not one single reference was made to the unfortunate act. Yet it was said that he was going to defend the Aldrich-Payne Act. He did defend it in the only way that any Republican can defend it. The entire strength of his defense lay not only in the failure to say one good word for it, but in the absolute failure to even mention it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But there is one man on that side of the House who has had the courage, or rather audacity, to attempt a defense of it, as I recollect now, and that was the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, my friend Mr. BOUTELL. At the very time he was delivering his speech every newspaper was burdened and every telegraphic wire was trembling with the deplorable news that the laboring people and others by the hundreds of thousands throughout the protected sections of the country were entering into solemn agreements to half starve themselves and their wives and children in order to get relief from the results of Republican legislation and the failure to enforce the antitrust laws by a Republican administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As my friend was speaking I was in a quandary whether more to admire his daring audacity or to pity his poor judgment in reminding the House and the country afresh, with commending praise, of the Payne Act, when every other Republican inside of the Capitol was trying to forget that there ever was such a thing as a Payne Act [applause on the Democratic side], and was praying that every Republican outside of the Capitol would forget that one of them ever participated in the passage of such an act. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I wish to acknowledge my debt of gratitude and thanks to the gentleman from Illinois for paying the splendid tribute to the South, in unfolding here the story of her marvelous growth. As he attributed that growth and prosperity to protection, let me remind him and the House that the products on which rests her prosperity go out by land and sea into the marts of the world, unaffected by the tariff except by its burdens, and meet the competition of all the nations. In spite of a mistaken view, as I believe, of some of her patriotic people, in my judgment the best thought, the best integrity, the best sense of fairness in the South demand for her industries, whether of mine or field or factory, no tariff protection.

She does not seek to place burdens upon the backs of any of the American people for her profit and benefit. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Subject only to revenue, limited to the necessities of government, she is content, sir, that Congress leave her to the laws of trade and the mercy of God, and then, relying upon her own resources and industry, she is ready and willing to work out her commercial destiny in the contest of trade against a competing world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] With this policy to the forefront, with her state governments in the hands of men of integrity, of prudence and economy, knowing neither favoritism nor greed nor graft, every southern heart thrills with conscious pride as he points to that young commercial empire lying south of the Potomac as the fairest and the happiest portion of the globe. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois charged that Democrats always applauded distress, and complained that, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], in his admirable speech some days ago, described the pitiable conditions of the school children in the city of Chicago, applause came from this side of the Chamber. He assumes to mistake a demonstration of protest for an applause of approval. As we listened with pain to the heartrending story revealed in the report of the public-school officials in Chicago of the thousands of little children daily going to school breakfastless and often to bed supperless; of their going about the streets hunting for the fallen crumbs of food and fishing through the garbage piles for scraps of refuse meat to keep their little souls and bodies together, if, sir,

I had failed to join with my colleagues on this side in a storm of protest against those distressing conditions, I would have been less than human. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My only regret is that the storm of protest was not loud enough and strong enough to reach with quickening effect the heart and conscience of every man in civil or official life responsible for such horrible conditions. [Applause on the Democratic side.] My surprise was that as I looked across this Chamber I saw more than a hundred of you Members sitting there unmoved and untouched, with an indifference as stoic as marble.

But the gentleman from Illinois said that it was denied that those conditions existed in 1908 or that they exist now. However, I understand the superintendent of schools wrote here after Mr. HENRY's speech and gave out an interview in the Chicago papers declaring that the pity of it was that this tale of woe was too true. The very day, the very moment that my friend Mr. BOUTELL was making his speech the papers of his city were bringing the news that not only among the children but among the laboring people there was actual suffering. I read from the Chicago Record-Herald:

Alderman Thomas F. Scully announced yesterday that on next Monday night he will introduce an order in the city council asking that body to take official cognizance of the prevailing high prices of food products, and to grant permission to investigate. "Something must be done," said Alderman Scully; "out in my ward and in many of the sections of the city the working people are actually suffering."

The prices of food products are so high in the protected city of Chicago that according to the report of the food commissioner the poor people and laboring people are being fed on old, maimed, worn-out horses. I read the other day in the papers that the children in New York City were hunting through the streets and garbage piles, picking up scraps of everything they could get, even to cigar bands, and making soup out of them—and this under the Aldrich-Payne bill! [Laughter.]

And I read, too, that the food commissioners of some of the States in the protected section were discussing whether or not they should allow the poor people to buy billy-goat meat as mutton. My friends, you may talk about the hard times under the Wilson-Gorman Act, but I will be blessed if the people ever got down to eating old worn-out horses and billy goats and making soup out of cigar bands in order to keep from perishing. [Laughter.]

Relative to the present conditions in Chicago, I find in another Republican paper, the Chicago Tribune, of January 28, 1910, the day after the first speech of the gentleman, the following:

CHILDREN FORCED TO WORK.

High cost of living is blamed by Superintendent Robert L. White, of the Elgin public schools, for a noticeable increase in the number of children under 16 years of age who have left the schools and gone into factories and shops. Seventy-five students, between the ages of 14 and 16, left the schools at the opening of the second semester this week. Of this number 22 are girls. Each case was investigated, and it was found necessary that the students work to assist in the support of their families.

And this under the Aldrich-Payne Act!

Think of it. Out in the protected city of Chicago, where the meat trust and the steel trust hold sway, even the children of their labor must leave the schools and dedicate their little tender bodies to the shop machine to supplement the wages of their parents in order to keep the family from perishing—under the Aldrich-Payne Act!

Such conditions prevail not only in Chicago, but throughout the protected sections of the country. Here is an item from the Duluth Herald, in the State of Minnesota, of February 1, 1910, another good Republican paper:

WAGES FOR WORKINGMEN NOT EQUAL TO COST OF LIVING—CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS HAVE TO HELP FAMILIES OF MEN WITH JOBS.

Miss Jean Poirier, state factory inspector, says: "At the present time much suffering exists in families where the father is constantly at work. * * * The situation is really alarming when a man can not earn enough to feed and keep his family in comfort. There is no end to these cases. * * *

"The problem is a serious one to all those that labor for a living, and it seems to be growing more serious every day. It has been brought home more forcibly the last few weeks when applications to charitable organizations have been received for assistance from the families of men with steady jobs."

In the protective-tariff State of Minnesota, men who have steady jobs, to supplement their scant wages, must seek charitable institutions and beg alms to help support their wives and children—and this under the Aldrich-Payne Act!

Let us now turn from this picture of gloom and distress to one of brightness and cheer and happiness. In the very issue of the Chicago paper that tells us of the "actual suffering" of the laboring people we read in another column with flaming, jubilant headlines:

PAY EXTRA ON STEEL—PROFIT SHOWS A TREMENDOUS GAIN.

The statement of the corporation's net earnings for the final quarter of 1909 showed a total of $40,971,309. This brought the earnings for the full year up to $131,479,975, as compared with $91,826,520 in 1908.

The dispatches of a few days thereafter brought the still more cheering news that Armour & Co., head of the meat trust, for the last year, according to its report, had made 35 per cent dividend.

And yet the very laboring men that helped them make these immense profits must take their little children out of school to supplement their wages and must apply to charitable institutions in order to keep the wolf of want and hunger from the door. And this under the Payne-Aldrich Act, that no Republican on that side has got the courage to openly defend. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I was a little amused at the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] persisting, in his two speeches, in calling this act the "Payne Act." And I wondered what he must have had against the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that caused him to shoulder upon him the sole responsibility for this legislative curse. I had supposed that its name was the "Aldrich-Payne Act." And I believe the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is willing for somebody else to help him shoulder the responsibility of that act. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say that "the gentleman from New York" will be very happy to shoulder the entire responsibility for the recent tariff bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Then I can only say to the gentleman that he is willing to tote more than any man I have ever seen. [Laughter.]

Now, if he will permit me, I will say further that if the "near insurgents" are successful in the plot to which I shall hereafter allude, they are not going to let him have a chance to shoulder any more responsibility in this House. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Well, now, gentlemen, the country has understood the act was the Aldrich-Payne Act. I can not see why any man in the world in the face of present conditions should want to be proud to have that offspring named after him. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] The newspapers, the periodicals, and the people of the country know it as the Aldrich-Payne Act. When we contemplate the actual suffering of the laboring people and the hungered condition of their children throughout the protected sections on the one hand, and the immense profits and dividends of the steel trust and the meat trust on the other, all must admit that its name is most appropriate—the "All-rich-Pain Act." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] It bears the right name. It has brought what the Democrats predicted: Blessings to the all-rich, and the pain of hunger to millions of the poor. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The present conditions of the country stamp that name upon it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts attempted to relieve the gloom of the present situation by a discussion of conditions in 1908 and the prices of food products, especially meat products, in this and foreign countries in the summer of 1908 and in some previous years. He produced here a chart of prices made by some American ship in its travels during the summer of 1908, showing the prices of beef at Boston to be 9 cents; at Copenhagen, Denmark, 13 cents; at Stockholm, Sweden, 11 cents, and so forth. He was "conspicuously absent" in his discussion of the prices existing now and since the enactment of the Aldrich-Payne Act.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. KITCHIN. Why, certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman did not hear me quote from Mr. Gompers's report the conditions since the Payne bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I did not; but I did hear——

Mr. PAYNE. You ought to read that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I believe Mr. Gompers's article was written a very short time after the Aldrich-Payne Act, and the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, whose name is familiar to my friend, as I recall, put it in a speech which he made during the last tariff bill discussion in the Senate.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am sure the gentleman does not want to make a misstatement to this House. The Senator from Massachusetts did nothing of the sort. He put in the speech on January 31, this January; and in the very opening, in the words which I read from Mr. Gompers, he will find the account of the British Trade Congress at Ipswich, in September, after the passage of the Payne bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, now, is not that a pretty good time to see the effect of the Payne Act—one month? [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Just one month! I am talking about six months afterwards. The laboring people as well as other citizens in the city of Boston met a few weeks ago in Faneuil Hall, with an ex-governor of the State presiding, to protest against the hunger and suffering produced by the existing hard times and high prices in this country, and to seek a remedy for relief. I want to ask my friend seriously what consolation is it to a poor fellow in Boston, who is now hungry and half-starved because of high prices put upon meat products by the meat trust under the tariff, to produce charts and statistics to prove to him that in July, 1908, he could buy beef in Boston at 9 cents, but would have to pay 11 cents in Stockholm, Sweden? What he wants to know is how about beef and bacon in this country in January and February, 1910.

My friend reads with approval something from Mr. Gompers. I believe he has not heretofore entertained a very high regard for this gentleman. He says that Mr. Gompers found when in Europe that meat was from 25 to 100 per cent higher than in America. Is that what he said?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman want what Mr. Gompers did say?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Gompers says:

How often do these people eat meat is a question the American in Europe finds himself asking when looking among the wage-earners. Meat is usually from 25 to 100 per cent higher in price than in the United States.

Mr. KITCHIN. The statistics you produced yesterday, if correct, condemn the figures of Mr. Gompers as untrue. There seems to be a conflict between you and Mr. Gompers as to meat prices. According to the statistics contained in the speech of the Senator referred to, the poor man can buy in Europe for 10 or 12 cents as much loaf bread as he can get here for 20 or 25 cents.

Perhaps, you will find some places in Europe where meat may be a little higher than in some places here, but Mr. Gompers did not tell you what kind of meat it was. I notice that statistics show that horse meat is twice as high in some places in Europe as it is in Chicago and Boston. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman mean the House to infer that Mr. Gompers made any report on the cost of horse meat?

Mr. KITCHIN. He must do it, if the figures that you gave yesterday are correct. I believe it is the first time in several years that any Republican has quoted or applauded with approval anything that Mr. Gompers has said or done. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] And I believe you are trying now to atone for his jail sentence, for which, in the final analysis, the policies of you standpatters are responsible. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But you must take your choice between Mr. Gompers and a Republican. I do not know what Mr. Gompers said or what he meant, but I do know that there is one distinguished Republican in this country who, as an authority on the subject, no Republican will dispute. He is at the head of a great department in this Government, twelve years a member of a Republican Cabinet, hailing from the great agricultural State of Iowa, Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture. I do know that after Mr. Gompers wrote that article Mr. Wilson testified here before the District of Columbia Committee, on January 24 of this year, that the beef trust were selling meats to Europe and the foreigners cheaper than they were selling meat to the starving people in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am going to read what Mr. Wilson testified to just a few days ago, and then I want to see whether you Republicans will continue to applaud our friend Mr. Gompers and sit in silent contempt of what Mr. Wilson said. You may take your choice. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I hold in my hand his testimony. He said:

The food products of the American farmer are being sold in foreign countries to the consumers abroad for less than they are being sold to consumers at home.

Being asked what products he was talking about, he answered:

Meat products.

[Applause.]

Now, whom are you going to believe, and whom are you going to applaud? Who do you believe knew more about it? The gentleman from Illinois and the two gentlemen from Massachusetts who spoke yesterday asked, "How can you have low-price beef when you have high-price cattle?" Why, they want us to believe that the farmer is getting the benefit of these prices. They want us to believe that the farmer has created these distressing conditions by demanding high prices for his product. If it be true, as you claim, and I deny, that the farmer, the producer, is responsible for the high cost of living and is getting the benefit of the high prices, is it not mighty strange that when the steel-trust goods, the woolen-trust goods, and all other trust-made articles were soaring sky high, not a Republican in this Nation suggested an investigation of their high prices, but just as soon as they thought the farmers' products were too high then resolution after resolution, at both ends of the Capitol, are introduced to investigate the cause of these high prices and find a remedy to lower them? The beef trust first raised the cry that the farmer, the producer, was responsible. It declared that the farmer was in a trust to put up the price of cattle, hogs, and sheep. Then every defender and apologist of the trusts began to declare that the present suffering was to be attributed to the high prices demanded by the farmer for his product. Members of this House and Republicans elsewhere in this Capitol are now taking up the complaint started by the beef trust that the farmers in this country are responsible for the deplorable conditions of suffering and hunger prevailing among the laboring people and the children in our cities. In the name of the farmers of this country I protest against this outrageous libel upon them. The farmer, the cattle producer, is not getting the benefit of the high prices.

Mr. Wallace, the president of the Association of Meat Producers in the West, declared the other day that the farmer was not getting the benefit of these high prices. A good Republican paper in the city of Pittsburg declares:

While in the course of a decade the market value of live stock has remained almost unchanged, the price of meat has been arbitrarily forced up to the present standard, under which positive suffering is inflicted upon the people in this country.

Mr. BATES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BATES. Does the gentleman undertake to inform this House and the country that the farmers' products are bringing them no higher prices to-day than they were ten years ago?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know——

Mr. BATES. I understood the gentleman to make that statement.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know of my own knowledge. I did not raise beef ten years ago, and we are talking about beef products; but I want to tell the gentleman one thing, the highest Republican authority in this country says they are not, and that is James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BATES. I ask the gentleman—I am not going to bother him, and I apologize for interrupting him——

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman does not interrupt me. [Laughter.]

Mr. BATES. Is it not a fact that fifteen or sixteen years ago——

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman said "ten years ago."

Mr. BATES. Or ten years ago that the price of live hogs was only about one-half of what it is to-day? They sold yesterday for 9½ and 10 cents, live weight. Did the gentleman ever know farmers to obtain such prices as that ten or fifteen or twenty years ago?

Mr. KITCHIN. We were discussing cattle and beef products prices. But about live hogs; statistics show that in 1893, under Cleveland's administration, the farmer of the West got more for his live hogs than he has since. But let us get back to beef and meat.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if it is not a fact that Secretary Wilson stated in his testimony that the price of stock cattle, the cattle that the farmer sells to the feeders, is no higher now than it was ten yeras ago?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is correct. I have Secretary Wilson's testimony right here, and I will read it for the benefit of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BATES. If the prices are no higher now than they were, what is the gentleman complaining about?

Mr. KITCHIN. We say that the beef on the hoof, the farmer's product, is no higher now than it was then, but after it gets into the hands of the Beef trust, with the cent and half and 2-cent tariff, they control the price of the dressed product absolutely, and they have put up the price to the consumer until now it is 50 per cent higher than it was ten years ago. That is our complaint against you; you have not divided the spoils with the farmer; you have taken it all for the trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, let me read what Secretary Wilson said on January 24, in his testimony:

We inquired into the prices that the farmer gets on the farm to ascertain whether the farmer was getting all the money of the country for the sale of his meat. We found that the stock steer on the farm, a 2-year-old steer, is not a particle dearer now than it was twelve years ago. You can buy them just as cheap now as you could twelve years ago.

But the product of the steer after it gets into the hands of the Armour, Swift, and Morris combine has been increased nearly 50 per cent. The very ground of the present prosecution of the beef trust in Chicago by the Government is that the big packers combine and fix absolutely the price to be paid the farmer for his live stock, to which he is forced to yield, and then in turn fix the price for the dressed product to which the dealer must yield. And thus the farmer, the retailer, and consumer are all sandbagged by the trust.

Recalling the introduction recently of two bills to remove the tariff from meat products, respectively, by two high-tariff Republicans prompts me to remind the House of a few significant acts passed by former Republican Congresses. When distress and want has seized the country, the Republican party has often resorted to Democratic policies in order to relieve that distress.

In 1866, when Portland, Me., was devastated by fire and her people were made homeless, a Republican Congress at once invoked a Democratic policy to relieve her unfortunate people, and placed for one year lumber and building materials on the free list. When, in 1871, the great fire in Chicago swept thousands of her people shelterless into the streets, again a Republican Congress vindicated a Democratic policy by removing the tariff for one year on building materials. It is still fresh in the minds of us all, when the coal trust, taking advantage of the great strike in the winter of 1903, were plundering by monopoly prices a suffering people, a Republican Congress, to relieve the distress, again resorted to a Democratic measure by removing for one year the tariff on coal; and now when millions of people, and especially the laboring people and their families, are suffering with hunger on account of the high cost of living exacted by the meat trust, at least two protective-tariff Republicans, to relieve the distress, are asking a Republican Congress to again adopt a Democratic theory of the tariff by putting upon the free list meat products. Now, I put this to your conscience and judgment: If it was a good thing to relieve the freezing people from the avarice and greed of the coal cormorants in 1903 by putting coal on the free list for a year, why would it not be a good thing to make this Democratic measure permanent, in order to forever hereafter prevent the coal barons forcing the people to the freezing point? If the enactment into law of a Democratic measure was a wise and good thing for a year to relieve the suffering and distress of the people of the cities of Portland and Chicago and help them to rebuild their homes, why would it not be wise and good and just to crystallize that policy into a permanent statute to help millions of our homeless people to build their first homes? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DAWSON. Will the gentleman give us his opinion as to what chance the proposition for free building material would stand at this time, particularly upon the Democratic side of the aisle?

Mr. KITCHIN. We are not discussing free building materials now. We are talking about keeping the fellows from starving out in your State, in Illinois, Minnesota, and the other protected States; and I want to tell you right now, every Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee, every Democrat in this House, will vote for either one of these free meat-product bills, if you will give us an opportunity, to help relieve a suffering people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DAWSON. There are no starving people in Iowa, let me say to the gentleman. I understood the gentleman was discussing free lumber, and I would like to ask him——

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, the gentleman is getting away from the subject.

Mr. DAWSON. How many on that side, I would like to ask, would vote for it now?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman asks now how free lumber would stand on this side of the House. I will tell the gentleman. It would get an overwhelming majority, as it did in the last session, and I will ask him now how would a bill to put meat products on the free list to feed the hungry people of the country stand on the Republican side of the House? [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will anticipate the question that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is about to ask. Lumber was not put on the free list in the case of the Chicago fire. All other building materials were. The little lumber trust in Chicago, even at that time, had influence enough with a Republican Congress to prevent that.

Again, I put it to your conscience and judgment: If a protective tariff is a blessing to all the people, as you always argue, and not to the few only, and you are honest and sincere in the argument, then why, in the name of common sense and common humanity, in order to relieve the distress caused by the Portland and Chicago fires, instead of removing the tariff on building materials did you not increase it? If protection is a blessing, why did you not increase the protection in order to increase the blessing and thereby more easily relieve the distress? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the people were freezing in 1903, if protection was a great blessing to the people of this country, instead of putting coal on the free list, why did you not increase the protection on coal in order to multiply the blessings to the people and thereby relieve the suffering. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If protection is a blessing to the people, why did not my protective-tariff friends, Mr. GARNER of Pennsylvania and Mr. FOELKER of New York, introduce bills to raise the tariff on food products instead of removing it in order to relieve the present distress? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Gentlemen, your conduct and your record are against your sincerity or against the soundness of your argument.

Mr. Chairman, I want my friend Mr. BOUTELL and my other friends across the aisle to go back and tell the people of Boston and Pittsburg and Philadelphia and New York and Chicago that two bills are now pending before the Ways and Means Committee, each of which was introduced by a protective-tariff Republican, promising to give some relief to the people of this country by removing the high tariff on meat products, and that not a Republican on that committee will dare attempt to bring it out and give the House a chance to vote on it. Tell them that a Republican committee and a Republican House refused even to consider a measure for their relief.

But the standpatters now say that the tariff does not and can not affect one way or the other the price of food products.

In fact the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] attempted to show, amid Republican applause, by his charts and statistics that food products, especially meat products, were much cheaper in this country than in any other country in the world. I need not suggest the ridiculous position in which this argument puts the high-tariff standpatters. In every tariff debate for the last forty years protection advocates have based their argument and appeal for high tariff on the fact that the prices were higher in this country than anywhere else, and that the high tariff was necessary to maintain such prices and to prevent other countries competing with us with their cheaper goods. And now after the new high tariff has been enacted and the people are complaining of the excessively high prices under this tariff, the standpatters are now answering their complaints by declaring and attempting to prove that the necessaries of life—food products—are cheaper here than in any other nation of the world. If it be true that the tariff has nothing to do with the prices of meat products, why is it that the Aldrich-Payne Act levies a tariff of 4 cents per pound on hams and 4 cents per pound on bacon and 1½ cents per pound on beef and from 15 per cent to 30 per cent on fish? If the tariff does not affect it, then you levied that tariff and retain it for the purpose of deceiving the supposed beneficiaries. But we know and the country knows that you put this tariff upon the meat products for the purpose of building a wall behind which to shelter the meat trust in plundering the people. Does the tariff upon meat products affect or raise the prices? Let Republican witnesses answer. Prof. William B. Guthrie, of the chair of economics in the College of the City of New York, a Republican, in an article in the Philadelphia North American, a Republican paper, of date January 23, 1910, says:

> The tariff is one of the major influences in the rise of food products.

Mr. Byers, attorney-general of the State of Iowa, a Republican, in an interview published in the Des Moines Capital, on January 31, 1910, a Republican paper, in fixing the blame for the present high prices of food products declared that—> the responsibility for the high prices lies wholly upon the trusts, the excessive tariff, the exorbitant transportation charges, the stock and grain gambling, and if any one is more to blame than the other of these I would fix their responsibility about in the order I have named.

The New York Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, a Republican paper, in its issue of January 24, 1910, asserting that the tariff and trusts are the main causes of the high prices of food products, said:

> The matter can not be normally regulated either by boycott or prosecution, but only by the unfettered law of supply and demand.

The Pittsburg Leader, a Republican paper, of issue of January 26, 1910, said:

> According to Secretary Wilson, exported meat is sold for far less abroad than is demanded at home for identically the same cuts. In short, in order to maintain low prices abroad, open robbery is practiced on the markets at home. The bill introduced to remove duties on meat products should be passed, and speedily, for at present the tariff goes beyond its intended usefulness by safeguarding the packers and retailers, and making it impossible for the public to get a square deal. If Congress does not do it, Taft should have it done. Let the President remember that every day he delays he is making countless thousands suffer.

The Harrisburg Star, Republican, of January 26, 1910, says:

Let the Government "bust" one of the mammoth trusts and prices will drop, because the big fellows are keeping them up. Let the Government take every cent of protection off such products as are sold more cheaply to the foreign than the domestic consumer, and prices will fall.

But however great may be the demand, the people need not expect relief by removal or reduction of the tariff on food products. Not a Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee will dare move to report out any such bill, though many are now pending before it, unless the meat trust consents.

With the permission of the House, I now desire to advert to the distress which prevails among our friends across the way. If a high protective tariff is a blessing producer and a suffering reliever, the Aldrich-Payne Act surely ought to be putting in its good work over on that side. If it is really a measure of relief, the Speaker's room ought to be plastered all over with Aldrich-Payne acts. [Laughter.] Much has been said here pro and con about the groanings of the people under this blessed act. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] declared that there were no groanings down in Texas, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] said there were lots of groaning out in Chicago. I do not know about this, but I believe I know where there has been some groaning since the recent passage of the Norris resolution, which no man will dispute. They tell me that in the Speaker's room the groanings have been so loud and so long as to find expression in such emphatic nouns and adjectives that to repeat them here would be most unparliamentary. [Laughter and applause on Democratic side.] I see in the Republican press that the Speaker is inclined to question a man's Republicanism if he groans any under the recent tariff act. When the Republican congressional committee met here some time ago, the latter part of January, it is said that one of my near-insurgent friends—the term "near-insurgent," gentlemen, describes that class of Republican Members who are always talking against Cannonism and the rules and always voting for Cannonism and the rules [laughter and applause on Democratic side]—my good friend from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], so goes the report, arose in the meeting (and, gentlemen, I am just quoting, you know, from Republican sources—the Republican organs of the country—and, of course, you understand, I can not vouch for their character for exact truth) [laughter], and looking around to see that the doors were shut and all the windows down—he did not want it to get out—said:

Gentlemen, you can say just what you please, but there are two things that we have got to go up against out in Michigan.

Being asked what they were, he answered:

First, Cannonism; second, high prices of living among the poor people and the laboring people under this here Aldrich-Payne tariff.

[Laughter.]

The Speaker did not mind the "Cannonism" suggestion, but that any Republican—and a Representative at that—should be groaning under the Aldrich-Payne Act aroused him, and he up and said:

This Aldrich-Payne Act is the best tariff act ever put upon the statute books. It is a party measure, and it is the duty of every good Republican to stand by it—

And he did not want any groaning around here under it, either. [Laughter.] Whereupon the gentleman from Michigan meekly arose and said:

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am just as good a Republican as you are, but—I did not mean to groan; I did not go to do it, but the people out in my district have been groaning so loud under this here tariff act, that I was just bound to groan a little through sympathy.

[Loud laughter and applause.]

After the Speaker was assured that it was only a sympathetic and not a personal groan, it is said that he was willing to leave the staunchness of their respective Republicanism to an umpire, who decided it was a tie between them. [Laughter.]

With much pain and sorrow, I proceed now to reveal to the House the horrible conspiracy which is slowly but surely advancing here against the head of the king.

I read from the New York Tribune, the great Republican organ:

A number of the regulars in the House of Representatives, conservative men, and little prone to political hysteria, have arrived at the conclusion that not only must Speaker CANNON abdicate his throne, but that there must be a change in the leadership of the lower body. These regulars are all part of the so-called Cannon machine in the House, and have been for years earnest laborers for the success of the Republican party, and men who concern themselves deeply lest it should make a mistake at a crucial moment.

* * * * * * *

They feel that in order to assure an increase in the Republican majority in the House they will have to announce their unwillingness to vote again for Speaker CANNON. They feel that it would be wise to announce his withdrawal before the campaign begins.

[Laughter.]

And in another issue:

While those regulars in the House who place their wishes for the success of the Republican party above their desire to gratify Mr. CANNON still hope that the Speaker will soon announce his withdrawal from the field, preparations are being made to eliminate him from the present dangerous situation—if necessary, by compulsion. Each day the ranks of those who admit that "Cannonism" and the high cost of living are the only two issues which the Republicans need fear in the next campaign are increasing. To-day, for the first time, definite plans for the removal of the former issue were discussed by regular Republicans. Several plans are talked of, which may not be carried out for several weeks, but it is practically assured that before the close of the present Congress a great number of Republicans will put themselves on record as opposed to Mr. CANNON'S reelection to his present position.

[Laughter.]

[Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, for eight years I have seen in this House a strong man, an intellectual giant, riding the very whirlwinds and directing the storms for his party. I have seen this remarkable man, who is called a "king," a "czar," an "autocrat," wield more power than the President. I have seen his party in the House erect for him a throne, and he has sat as its undisputed ruler. He has controlled his party. He has controlled legislation. He has stood here for nearly forty years a bulwark of strength for his party. He has been the very god of the standpatters' idolatry. For Republican policies he has behind him a proud record and a great service, and to them he has given active loyalty. For long years he has been the central figure of the Nation's Capitol. But, alas, no more!

I have touch'd the highest point of all my greatness,
And from that full meridian of my glory
I haste now to my setting.

* * * * *

Farewell, a long farewell, to all my greatness.

This sad retrospect is being pressed to his lips.

My friends, my heart is crushed with grief as I contemplate this powerful man writhing, helpless and hopeless, in the hands of the conspirators, his former friends and followers. I see him driven from the throne, repudiated and condemned. I see his head falling from the block and dangling at their belt.

Let us read on:

That these men have not gone about openly expressing their opinions is due not only to their desire that no impression of discord should go abroad, but to their extreme regard and loyalty to Mr. CANNON, whom they feel to be more the victim of unfortunate circumstances and frequent misrepresentation than of deserved and intelligent criticism. In a personal way it is probable that Speaker CANNON is more popular and respected at the Capitol to-day than at any other time in his career.

Now they are letting him down easy, bending his head for the ax, just as tenderly and lovingly as possible. [Laughter and applause.]

No friends are more unsparing in their praise and more lenient in their criticism than the men who now feel compelled to admit that Mr. CANNON'S present determination will be a detriment to the party in the coming congressional campaign.

I do not see, to save my life, with such pathetic appeals for the grand old party, how any man who has been Speaker for seven or eight years and a Member of the House for thirty-six years can help making the sacrifice and get out of the way, in order to give the Republicans a majority in the next House. [Laughter.]

Again I read, and just listen at the woolngs of the conspirators:

All possible deference will be paid to the feelings of the Speaker, and it will be made clear that the Republican party has entire confidence in his sincerity and honesty of purpose and a grateful appreciation of his efforts in the past.

[Laughter.]

"Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker," they say, "we are willing to concede you every virtue and write for you a most splendid epitaph. In your execution we are going to be just as gentle and tender and loving as possible; but you, of course, understand that, in order to keep our heads on, it is necessary to lop your head off." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I will now read from the Republican papers the honor roll of these conspirators [laughter], men by whom the Speaker has always stood, and who, by his grace and strong right arm, have been lifted into favor and prominence. Here is the list of the honor-roll men, who are going to help assassinate the great Cæsar [laughter]:

FOSTER of Vermont [laughter], AMES, BARCLAY, BARNARD, CASSIDY, COCKS of New York, COLE, CRUMPACKER, DAVIDSON, DIEKEMA—

[Laughter.]

And here I am reminded of a little incident I saw in a Republican paper the other day, which is too good to keep. As the story goes, the whip for the majority, the popular gentleman from New York [Mr. DWIGHT], approached his floor leader and said:

Mr. PAYNE, they are going to try to get Mr. CANNON to decline to be a candidate for the Speakership in the next Congress, and I understand that if he does decline, DIEKEMA is going to be a candidate to succeed him.

The serene gentleman from New York, with a frown of the forehead and a scratch of the head, replied:

DIEKEMA, DIEKEMA! Why, who is DIEKEMA, and where did he come from?

[Great laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DIEKEMA. May I ask that the gentleman's time be extended indefinitely? [Great laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time is under the control of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman fifteen minutes more.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am certainly under obligations to my friend Mr. DIEKEMA, in asking that I have unlimited time.

Mr. DIEKEMA. The gentleman is under obligation to the gentleman for his free advertising. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I would advise the gentleman never to take the advertising of an adversary. [Laughter.]

I return to the list of honor men:

HANNA, HENRY, GILLETT, HUBBARD of West Virginia, JOHNSON of Ohio, LAFEAN, LOUD, MCKINLEY of Illinois, MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan, MOON, MOORE, NYE, PRINCE, and SCOTT—

And my good friend TOWNSEND, they get him in twice. [Laughter.]

When and how will the "deep damnation of his taking off" occur?

I quote again from the Tribune:

The plan now talked of is to call a caucus within a few weeks, or when a majority of the Republicans in the House have approved the idea, to make some minor changes in the rules and in some diplomatic manner to put the caucus on record as opposed to Speaker CANNON'S re-election. Several of the regulars to-day made the prediction that a majority of the Republicans were now ready to take some such action, but that it might require several weeks of persuasion before they would be willing to enter such a caucus.

The plan will be prepared by the regulars, and the insurgents will be merely auxiliaries.

* * * * * * *

They do not believe that such a moment has arrived.

Not ready for the blow yet. Careful preparation must be made for the successful execution of the awful deed. Why postpone the tragedy? Gentlemen, you ought, like bold assassinators, strike the fatal blow at once. It is cruel to torture him with this long, hard, writhing, lingering death. [Laughter.]

Why, even the cruel Macbeth, in pondering the murder of Duncan, felt compassion for his victim:

If it were done, when 'tis done, then 'twere well it were done quickly.

[Laughter.]

I commend to you conspirators, you near-insurgents and deserting regulars, the humanity of murderous Macbeth. [Laughter.]

History tells us that the men who caused the execution of Louis of France ordered that he be hurried to the block and that the ax fall quickly, to save him pain and humiliation. My friends, if it must be done, let it be done quickly. Permit me to read a few head lines in different Republican papers:

CANNON has got to go!
No more of Cannonism.
Don't want any more of Uncle JOE.

And here comes the Ohio State Journal headlining my friend TAYLOR thus:

TAYLOR of Ohio says he is done with Uncle JOE!

[Laughter and applause.]

And my good young friend COLE shouts: "Me, too!" [Loud laughter and applause.]

It is said that the whole Ohio Republican delegation has prayerfully come to the conclusion that it is best for the country, best for legislative reform, best for the promotion of Republican politics, best for the success of the grand old party that we have no more of Uncle JOE! [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I need not remind gentlemen that no delegation in Congress for the last eight years has done more to fasten Cannonism and the system on the House and the country than the Republican membership from Ohio.

Let me ask my Ohio friends and my friend from Michigan and my friend from Vermont and my other friends of the "honor roll" to get up in this House and point out one single measure the Speaker has ever advocated since they entered this body that they did not advocate. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] Let them name one measure the Speaker ever opposed that they did not oppose. Let them mention one single policy the Speaker has ever pursued that they did not indorse. I challenge them to get up before us, who know their record and votes, and tell their constituents and the people of the country what rule or rules has CANNON or Cannonism ever presented to the House that they did not vociferously advocate and vote for? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] These good Republican friends from Ohio and Vermont and Michigan and elsewhere can play MURDOCK and COOPER and NORRIS and other progressive Republicans back home among their people, but they can not play their parts before us who know their records. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] You can not powder and wig up like the MURDOCKS and the COOPERS and the NORRISES and the LINDBERGHS and come out and make your speeches before us. [Laughter.]

We see you behind the curtains making up. You can not strut the stage with such indignant reforming air here before us with straight faces. We know you, and you know that we know you are playing. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] You may be able to fool the folks at home, but in justice to the Speaker, in justice to your constituents, in justice to the country, you ought to rise in your seats here, before these gentlemen who know your records and your votes, and specify on what particular measure or policy or method or rule you have ever differed with the Speaker since you have been a Member of this House and when and where you have ever failed to follow or indorse him [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Oh, yes; Uncle JOE has just got to go, for the good of the grand old party. Now, let me ask you, suppose the Speaker does go, what are you willing to promise your constituents at home? Are you willing to pledge them that you will elect as Speaker one of these 25 or 30 real, progressive insurgents who have been against Cannonism and the rules for years and, at times, too, when it meant ostracism by their colleagues, or will you help put in somebody just as near like Uncle JOE as possible? Unless you promise your constituents that if you are elected you will not only not vote for the Speaker to succeed himself, but that you will not vote for any one of the 185 Cannonites over there, you will do nothing to promote legislative reform.

If you are sincerely opposed to Cannonism and its system; if you desire to see the one-man power destroyed in this House; if you wish to put beyond the power of the Speaker the naming of the Rules Committee; if you wish to prevent him from packing committees to keep in or bring out such measures as he wills; if you wish the majority of the House to have power to legislate when and on what it desires, then, sirs, you should be willing to pledge your constituents that, if elected, you will vote neither for CANNON nor a Cannonite either in the caucus or in the House for Speaker; that you will vote only for one who by his record here has proven his earnest opposition to Cannonism.

But, Uncle JOE has got to go! My friends, I do not know how he feels about it, but when I see gentlemen who have always been regulars and who have always received the Speaker's smiles deserting him now one by one, there comes to my mind the thought of the poet:

The wretch whom gratitude once fails to bind,
To truth, to honor, to virtue let him lay no claim.
But stand confessed before the world the brute disguised in man.

I commend it to the Speaker. [Laughter.]

I can seen how a Republican Member, who is simply a humble subject, can desert his king under stress of circumstances for the good of the grand old party, but how gentlemen whom he has lifted out of the ordinary into prominence and given chairmanships of committees can turn their backs upon him I can not understand.

I have forgotten which one of Milton's works this is in, but I bet the Speaker can tell me: [Laughter.]

Swinish gluttony ne'er looks to heaven
Amidst his gorgeous feast;
But with besotted, base ingratitude
Crams and crams, then turns to blaspheme his feeder.

[Laughter and applause.]

After feasting at the hands of the Speaker's generosity, now they turn to condemn him. I will not venture even to guess how often of late he has repeated these words. As I said, the Speaker can refer you to the page. [Applause and laughter.]

It is but fair to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to notify him that this terrible plot encompasses his overthrow as floor leader. In the closed-door meeting of the Republican congressional committee, according to the Republican organ, one of my near-insurgent friends—

Intimated also that the floor leader, Representative SERENO PAYNE, of New York, should relinquish that position at the end of this Congress, so that a younger and more agile man might take his place.

[Laughter.]

Let me read further:

Some of them, however, agreed that Mr. PAYNE should relinquish the floor leadership to a younger man. It has not been suggested that he withdraw from the inner councils of the organization, for on all sides he is recognized as a most sagacious and sane of advisers—

Oh—

Thou cutt'st my head off with a golden ax!—

[Laughter.]

but it is believed by a number of his friends that he should be supplanted by a man who is more in touch with the Republican Members, who comes into contact with the entire majority.

He keeps himself, they say, too much in cold storage. [Laughter.] He does not mix with "the boys," and smoke and joke and pat them on the back enough. He does not jolly them like my good friend, Hon. JOE GAINES [laughter]— and whose perspective has not, perhaps, been blurred by viewing for many years the Republican membership from a niche in the Speaker's anteroom—

[Laughter.]

Oh, just listen, if you please:

In the opinion of those who desire some change he should be reserved as a piece of heavy artillery which can be brought into the legislative fight after the more modern and sprightly sharpshooters have found the enemy.

[Much laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina may have time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Of course, Mr. Chairman, the Committee of the Whole can not give unanimous consent, but I will yield fifteen minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I am certainly gratified to know that these gentlemen who desire to get rid of my distinguished friend from New York and reserve him as a piece of "heavy artillery" are giving a very fine excuse for him to voluntarily retire under fire. [Laughter.] They say the gentleman from New York—and in my opinion he physically and intellectually is one of the most vigorous and strongest men here—is too old, and that when forced out he can console his pride with this explanation. My friends, I do not believe the gentleman from New York is much older than he was when you passed the act now called by you the Payne Act. I do not believe it is the age of the gentleman from New York that is troubling Members who want to behead him, but it is the age of the act, of which he is half father, that is getting too old for the judgment and consciences of your constituency and the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Another gentleman comes out, saying that he thinks more of the Speaker than anybody else in the world, but the only reason he has for being against him is that "Uncle JOE is getting too old." Now, gentlemen, if you have ever seen a younger man in all your life—well, I never have. [Laughter.] I want to tell these men who are putting up that excuse that he is but a few days older than when you stood loyally by him on the Norris resolution and tried to fasten with a tighter hold Cannonism on the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He is only a few months older than when he, with your aid and consent, named the Rules Committee, with himself as chairman, and—I do not want to say "packed," but I do not know any better word—he is not much older than when he fixed up the committees of this House so that legislation could be kept in or brought out according to his will. It is not the age of the Speaker, gentlemen, but it is the constituency back yonder at home that is worrying you. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But Uncle JOE has got to go!

And you are asking your people to send you back to fight and destroy the Speaker and his system.

Mr. Chairman, some years ago I was in New York and I went to hear Joe Jefferson play Rip Van Winkle. As I saw him in rags and tatters and heard him tell his pathetic story, a pitiless, friendless, helpless, hopeless wreck, I found myself with my handkerchief to my face wiping away the tears. I looked about me and saw 5,000 others doing the same thing. Then I caught myself and said: "What a fool I am, crying here over that miserable fellow of the stage, when the man behind those rags is a millionaire and never felt the want of a luxury! He is acting, simply acting!" And back went the handkerchief into my pocket. Then I sat there and knew it was Joe Jefferson playing instead of Rip Van Winkle living.

When I think, Mr. Chairman, of how these militant gentlemen are going to vote against Uncle JOE, how they are going to repudiate him, how they are going to send him out of the Capitol, drive him out of the city back to Danville, a political outcast, and picture him as he sits at the car window on his way homeward, peering into space, repudiated, "unwept, unhonored, and unsung," murmuring to himself:

* * * My way of life
Is fallen into the sere, the yellow leaf;
And that which should accompany old age,
As honor, love, obedience, troops of friends,
I must not look to have, but in their stead
Curses, deep-mouthed curses—

when I see him stepping off the train at Danville, stretching out his hand to his people, pleading with the pathos of the fallen cardinal:

An old man broken with the storms of state
Is come to lay his weary bones among ye—

O Mr. Chairman, when I contemplate this pitiable picture I am overwhelmed with saddest emotion, my heart melts, my eyes fill with tears, and—I catch myself again and say: "What a fool I am! Why, FOSTER and HAMILTON and COLE and TAYLOR and the whole hosts of near-insurgents are acting, acting, simply acting!" [Prolonged applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Yes, Mr. Chairman, they are coming back to fight mightily against Uncle JOE. What are you going to do? "Oh, I am coming back here to Washington and I am going to fight him." Where? "I am going to fight him in the caucus." How? I will tell you. They are going into the caucus, as they always have, but this time with blood in their eye, until the door is shut, and then they are going to stretch out their hands, with a knowing wink, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. DWIGHT] and the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CURRIER], and others of the House machine, and say, "Tie tight; tie good." [Laughter.] And while they are being tied, I know them so well, I fancy I can hear them say, "You are tickling; you are tickling." [Prolonged laughter.] Then after it is all over and Uncle JOE is the caucus nominee and again Speaker by their vote in the House, they will sob and say, "I could not help it; I had to stand by my party; it made me do it." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yes, I see them tying my friends from Ohio and Vermont and Michigan and all of these other near insurgents, tying them good; and then I see them sitting there voting against Uncle JOE, when they knew at the very time they entered the caucus that three-fourths of the Republicans in that caucus were for Uncle JOE. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] When their constituents ask, "What did you do that for?" they are going to say, "Oh, I could not help it; see how they bound me; I had to be a Republican or a Democrat; but you just send me back one more time and I will go into the caucus and fight him again in the same old way." [Laughter.] Now, gentlemen, they are not fooling me; they are not fooling anybody on this side; and I know that there is one man in this House that they can not fool, and that is the Speaker himself. [Laughter.] There never was a more complacent countenance upon any man than the Speaker, although the papers have been full of abuse and criticism, and, I may say, sometimes of slander against him. I knew they were playing and the regulars knew they were playing, or else they were the biggest cowards in the world. For two months and a half the papers and periodicals in this country have raked in most scathing terms the Speaker, his rules, and his system, and yet not one single Republican on that side has had the nerve or the gratitude to say one defending word for the Speaker, except the Speaker himself. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen, let us be honest and candid. You know and we know that the Speaker represents and typifies the political sentiments and principles of more than three-fourths of the Republican membership in this House and in the Senate. He stood with you on the passage of the Aldrich-Payne Act. He stands, and so do four-fifths of you, for a tariff wall behind which to shelter the trusts in plundering the people. He is in favor, and so are four-fifths of you, of the protected barons writing the schedules of the tariff, instead of the representatives of the people. He favors, as do four-fifths of you, ship subsidy—granting to the ship syndicate the right to plunge its hands into the Federal Treasury and take the people's contributions to satisfy its passion for profits. He favors, as do four-fifths of you, power in the Speaker to name the Rules Committee, with himself as chairman. He favors, as do four-fifths of you, packing committees to defeat or enact measures as the Speaker wills. He favors, as do four-fifths of you, making the Speaker the autocrat of the House. He represents the policies of the Republican party as interpreted by a vast majority of its membership in Congress for the last ten years. These policies, with the fundamental idea of protection and favoritism to the few at the expense of the many, demand Cannonism at the Capitol. Organized privilege could not exist twenty-four hours unless it had the system which prevails and has prevailed in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The system outside of the Capitol must have a system inside of it. Let us not mistake the situation. The Speaker is no better and no worse than the 185 Cannonites here. Cannonism is no better and no worse than the Republicanism that has held sway in Congress for a decade. The way to destroy Cannonism in the House is to defeat the men responsible for Cannonism.

Brutus, when he assassinated Cæsar, promised the Roman people a better than a Cæsar. I remind the people that his conspiring friends, in the contemplated assassination of the Speaker, make no promise of a better, but only of a weaker, than a CANNON.

If the people in the coming election shall again return to Washington a Republican House, and we must have a one-man power; if the Republican who occupies that chair must be an autocrat; if we must have a Cannonite as Speaker, then, sir, having some pride in the intellectuality and the courage of this body, I would prefer to see Mr. CANNON in the chair. I had rather see a giant there than a weakling. I would rather have a lion there than a fox. [Loud and prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that one exposes himself to criticism and to misrepresentation if in this House he shows the least tendency toward independence. For many centuries the members of the human race have been surrendering their independence. In fact, there never was but one absolutely independent man, and that was Adam in the early days of his experience in the Garden of Eden. Adam was the original czar. Why, the Speaker of the House of Representatives in his most halcyon days was never in the same class with him. There were no insurgents, redheaded or baldheaded, in those days to say him nay. Even the animals that came to him to be christened could register no appeal. A cow became a cow for all time, and the donkey became a donkey for all time.

But all that came to an end. You remember the morning when it happened. It was that morning when he got up feeling a stitch in his side, as though something had been interfering with his ribs. As he stalked down the avenue lined with those beautiful flowers which he had just named "American beauty" roses he met Eve. Then it was all up with Mr. Czar Adam. She did not take any stock in his talk about how the majority must rule and how the majority had its responsibilities and how the majority must move forward, and how he was that majority. From that moment he was just plain Mr. Adam.

I said that Adam was the only man who was absolutely independent. The moment he met Eve he surrendered more than half of that independence. And from that day to this, as the family has expanded into the tribe and as the tribe has expanded into the nation, and as the nation has expanded into the civilized world, the sons of Adam continued to surrender their independence in order to secure and enjoy the benefits of advancing civilization. We Americans boast of our independence, and our orators tell us on the Fourth of July how we are a land of liberty, a land of freedom, a land of independence, and yet it is an unquestioned fact that whenever a man becomes a citizen of the United States he must necessarily surrender a very large portion of the independence which was given to him by his Creator. It is an axiomatic fact that in popular government, wherever situated, the majority must rule. It is the fundamental principle of popular government that the minority must submit to the rule of the majority so long as it remains the majority. So I, as an American citizen, am bound to yield peacefully to the will of the majority so long as that majority remains. But while this is true, it is also true that it is my right and privilege as an American citizen and my duty as an American citizen, if I believe that the majority is wrong and that I am right, to use my best endeavors to see that the minority of to-day becomes the majority of to-morrow.

So it is with parties. Political parties are necessary in this country. We are governed by political parties. And in order to secure party solidarity, and therefore party efficiency, it is equally necessary that the majority should rule within the party; that the minority yield peacefully to the will of the majority so long as it remains the majority. But while this is true, it is equally true that I, as a member of my party and still an American citizen, have the right and the privilege and the duty, if I believe that I am right and the majority of my party wrong, to use my best endeavors to see to it that my minority within my party to-day becomes the majority of to-morrow. It is this that gives vitality and virility to parties and preserves them from stagnation. Old ocean itself would stagnate into rottenness but for the ceaseless action of the remorseless waves and tides.

Having said this much it is unnecessary to add that I am not entitled to the compliment which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] would bestow upon me by calling me an insurgent or a near insurgent. I never have been an insurgent. It has been my steadfast faith that the problems which confront us as a party could be worked out to better and more lasting advantage within our party lines. So during the last Congress, while I insisted that there should be a change in the rules of the House I set about to secure the change through the party organization. The result was the adoption of the rule providing for calendar Wednesday, which has wrought a veritable revolution in the procedure of the House. When we organized the House at the opening of the extra session last March I had no sympathy with the movement which resulted in a combination with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and his Democratic friends to humiliate the Speaker of the House. I resent the implication that a Republican who shows the least inclination toward independence is an insurgent. Lincoln expressed the true doctrine of Republicanism in the phrase: "In essentials, unity; in nonessentials, liberty; in all things, charity." I stand for party unity as to all essentials, and I insist that I shall not be called opprobrious names when I stand for individual freedom as to nonessentials.

In four successive Congresses I have supported for the Speakership the gentleman who now occupies the Speaker's chair. But because I have supported him four times I shall not be charged with ingratitude or with insurgency or with forgetfulness if, as a Member of the next Congress, acting upon my judgment and conscience, I determine that the best interests of the Republican party and the best interests of the American people require me to support some other good Republican for the Speakership. I recognize the long public services of the present Speaker of the House. I yield him the loyal support that is due his official position. But, as an American citizen and as the personal representative of the people who sent me here, and as a Member of this House and as a member of the Republican party, I have my duties and my responsibilities, and it will continue to be my purpose to discharge those duties and responsibilities according to the best light that is given me.

It is true that when the Republican congressional committee, of which I am a member, met a few weeks ago to organize for the work of the campaign upon which we are about to enter for the reelection of a Republican House, I was called upon by the acting chairman to tell what the people of New England wanted. My reply was that the people of New England, in my judgment, desired, first of all, a Republican House to enact into law the legislative programme of President Taft; and, secondly, a new Speaker of the House of Representatives. In making that statement I declared that I had not the least personal feeling toward the present Speaker of the House. And I say now that if there is anything personal in all this between the gentleman who occupies the chair and myself, it is on his side, not on mine. But I submit that if I am a Member of the next House, the fact that I have voted for him four times for Speaker should not preclude me from voting for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] if, in my judgment, he is the best man for the place; or for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] if I think that, under all the circumstances, his selection would be the best; or for that other distinguished son of Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] if I decided that his selection would be the best for the party and for the country; or for the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] if I believed him the best man for the place. Nor am I limited to these men. We are no one-man party. We have many men in this House amply qualified and well equipped to fill the Speaker's chair.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] says, in effect, that in taking this position I am representing my constituents. I plead guilty to the charge. It is a question in which my constituents have a deep interest and in which they have the right to be deeply interested. The selection of a Speaker is a matter in which they have the right to have a voice through their Representative. And so long as I continue to be their Representative I shall continue to endeavor to voice their wishes in this behalf.

So I say again that the gentleman gives me an undeserved compliment in classing me with the insurgents. I have differed with the Speaker from time to time as to measures and methods. But I have thrashed out those differences within the party. I voted for the tariff bill which we passed last August and which President Taft says is the best Republican tariff law ever put upon the statute books. I did not vote for it because it was what I wanted, but because it was the best I could get. President Taft told the American people it was the best tariff law the Republicans ever put upon the statute books.

But if he had not been the perfect gentleman he is, he might have gone further and declared that while this statement was true, it was also true that he was disappointed in not being able to secure a better tariff law for them. If he had not been possessed of a keen sense of the proprieties, he could have gone further and insisted that Congress and not he was answerable for the fact that a better law was not enacted. And if he had not been thus possessed of a keen sense of the proprieties, he could have added that perhaps after all his mistake was that he did not follow the example of his distinguished predecessor and club Congress into submissiveness. Had he said this, the chances are that the American people, with genuine Methodist fervor, would have cried "Amen and amen!" But he said none of these things; he shared the responsibility with Congress. Since his inauguration he has fulfilled, so far as within him lay, the pledges of the party. We Republican Members of the House were elected upon the same platform. Our work is yet to be done. His recommendations are before us and it is our duty before the adjournment of the session to enact these recommendations into laws. These are the essentials on which there must be unity of action within our party. I stand for that unity. And I shall continue to stand as I have stood in the past for the dignity of the House. With unity there should be within the membership of the House an independence of spirit commensurate with the dignity of our positions.

So our good friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] may get all the enjoyment possible out of the situation. But let him not be deceived. Before this session closes, the Republican majority will have placed upon the statute books the substantial part of President Taft's legislative programme. This is what the American people want first of all. Then, when November rolls around and the congressional elections are held it will be found that the Republican party has its old-time majority in the House. We will move forward. We will regain the confidence of the public. We will reestablish the prestige of the House. We will vindicate its right to the title of a great deliberate legislative body.

Thus the seasons will come and go until the fateful year of 1912 rolls around. Then the peerless leader from the shoals and shallows of the Platte will again return and put the hook into the nose of my genial friend from North Carolina and of all those like-minded with him. Gently but firmly he will lead them to the national convention of the relic of the party of Jefferson and Jackson and Cleveland, which has become the despair of its political friends, the butt of its political opponents, and the laughingstock of the American people. There he will renominate himself for the Presidency amid uncontrolled enthusiasm. Then my friend from North Carolina and all those like-minded with him will be permitted to return home to pursue the even tenor of their way while the great American electorate, the peace army of the Republic, marches to the polls to reelect as President of the United States the distinguished statesman, the high-minded patriot, the beloved fellow-citizen, William Howard Taft. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that his time be extended long enough to answer my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is not within the control of the Chair nor the committee.

Mr. RAINEY. Then I ask that the gentleman on the other side yield him five minutes, in order that he may file a bill of particulars.

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to Members only when they make a personal request. Mr. Chairman, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL].

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, we have just concluded the omnibus pension bill, and I did not interrupt the proceedings, for I would not postpone for a moment the enactment of a measure carrying benefits so much deserved and so long delayed to so many meritorious men. But it must have occurred to the House, as it has to the country, that if every private bill introduced were allowed exactly as presented, thousands and thousands of disabled veterans whose claims upon our generous gratitude are equally imperative with those relieved would remain without adequate provision in the concluding days of their earthly pilgrimage. I favor this method and its liberal application only because no other seems available to effectuate what ought to be the national purpose, to render as comfortable and happy as possible the declining years of every member of those invincible battalions who followed Grant and Sherman and Sheridan and Logan and McPherson in their incomparable campaigns against the armed enemies of their country.

I venture at this moment to invite the attention of the House to the matter of pensions, because it is a subject of paramount concern to every patriotic citizen of the Republic. Our existing laws are so conflicting and confusing; so much formality has been required in their execution; so many extravagances have been tolerated in their administration; such a variety of technical defenses has been invented to defeat just applications; and such tedious delays have characterized the adjudication of honest claims that the old soldier, weary and perplexed and disappointed, is fast driven to doubt the good faith and fair intention of the Government whose perpetuity his fidelity and valor assured. Nearly half a million of the Union's defenders are on the pension rolls, and yet, forty-five years after the civil war terminated in a blaze of glory at Appomattox, the average value of each pension is only $14.58 per month. In the meantime we are annually expending for incidental charges vast sums that ought to go directly to the veteran. I undertake to enumerate some of these charges:

For medical examinations	$500,000
For attorneys' fees	322,000
For examining surgeons	189,000
For pension agencies	553,000
For special examiners	380,000
For salaries in the bureau	1,650,000
For soldiers' homes	2,200,000

Here is an aggregate of about $6,000,000 which ought to be disbursed to the pensioners themselves. Both the principal political parties declared in their last national platforms for more liberal pensions for our surviving soldiers. The great party with which I am affiliated said:

> Another Republican policy which must be ever maintained is that of generous appreciation for those who have fought in the country's battles and for the widows and orphans of those who have fallen. We commend the increase in the widows' pension made by the present Congress and declare for a liberal administration of all pensions laws, to the end that the people's gratitude may grow deeper as the memories of the heroic sacrifices grow more sacred with the passing years.

The Democratic party said:

> We favor a generous pension policy, both as a matter of justice to the surviving veterans and their dependents and because it tends to relieve the country of the necessity of maintaining a large standing army.

It must be assumed that these declarations were made honestly, to be redeemed faithfully. Accordingly, on the 12th day of April, 1909, I introduced and had referred to the appropriate committee the following bill:

A bill to provide for service pensions for surviving volunteer soldiers of the Army of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act every surviving volunteer soldier of the Army of the United States who served in the field for a period of three months, between the 1st day of April, 1861, and the 1st day of August, 1866, and who has been honorably discharged from said army, shall be entitled, from and after the date of his application therefor, and during his natural life, to a pension of $1 per day, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury appropriated for pensions.

SEC. 2. That applications for pensions under this act shall be accompanied by evidence identifying the applicant as the person whose name appears in the records of the organization to which said applicant claims to have belonged, and shall be verified as the law requires in other applications for pensions.

SEC. 3. That any person who shall receive a pension under the provisions of this act shall be held to have relinquished all right or claim to any other pension after the date of filing the application herein provided.
